It may be said that the Government, having taken over the railroads and fixed the rentals, owes no duty after the properties are turned back. The railroads were not consulted about being taken over. The Congress practically fixed the terms of the agreement, and the agreement was presented to the railroads to accept or reject, as they saw fit. Their only remedy, if they refused to accept the agreement, was to go into the Court of Claims and sue the Government—a remedy which, of course, was entirely inadequate, as the roads needed their income to pay interest and taxes.

The true relation of the Government to a public-service corporation is that the Government has regulatory powers to prevent the companies from earning more than a reasonable income. But it has no right to reduce that income to the basis of confiscation or to take the property over and destroy it. So the least that can be done is to continue this guaranty for a few months while the rates and operating expenses are being readjusted.

For those who may desire to examine the result of this guaranty I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD as "Appendix I" a statement covering the principal railroads in the eastern district, the southern district, and the western district, which will show the total Government guaranty, the result if that guaranty should be reduced 25 per cent, and the rate of dividends that were paid by each one of the railroads, so that anyone can examine it and see whether the guaranty is fair and reasonable during that time. I will not stop to comment on it now.

Second. How should the rates be made? Section 6 of the bill directs the commission to divide the country into rate-making districts, to make rates that would produce 5½ per cent upon the aggregate value of the property within the districts, with permission for another one-half per cent for nonproductive betterments, improvements, or equipment, and takes from each carrier a certain percentage over and above 6 per cent of the earnings, to be used, one half for a trust fund for the purpose of securing interest and dividends, and the other half for the benefit of all the railroads in the country. This is one-half between 6 and 7 per cent and one-quarter above that. I shall discuss these provisions separately.

The commission has found, by experience, that it is necessary to divide the country into districts for the purpose of rate making.

I think there is some misunderstanding in the Senate as to what these districts mean. So far as consolidation of the railroads is concerned, either permitted or forced, they make no difference. These districts are simply traffic districts, which are now being used by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of adjusting rates which will pay a fair return upon the property in each district.

For instance, take New England, which is a district by itself. The district north of the Ohio River, west of New York, and east of Chicago is another district. South of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi is another district. West of the Mississippi River and Chicago is another, and so forth. But these are only traffic districts for the purpose of arriving at how much revenue will be needed by the roads in each district. It would take a greater increase of rates in New England to make the roads solvent than it would in the districts west of the Mississippi River, and the commission therefore has in the past divided the country into such districts, and that is the only division of the country made anywhere in this bill. Consolidation follows along the lines of competition, the same as it has in the past and as I think it should continue to do in the future.

There is such a wide variance in the earning capacity and conditions of transportation in different parts of the country. To illustrate: New England is a country with many manufactories, large terminal expenses, and short hauls, while the district west of Chicago is a district of fewer manufacturing towns, long hauls, and different conditions of operation. These districts have already been unofficially recognized by the commission in rate adjustments, such as "Central Traffic Association," "Southern," and so forth. To illustrate, these districts would be substantially the following:

No. 1. New England.

No. 2. Between Chicago and New York, north of the Ohio River.

No. 3. South of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi.

No. 4. West of Chicago, which naturally divides into what is known as the western transcontinental and southwestern territories.

The transcontinental roads are taken by themselves. The western territory is the northern part, and the southwestern territory is Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, and so forth.

In these districts there is a wide variation between the roads. For instance, it would require a much greater increase in rates to make the New England roads solvent than it would the roads in the southern or western districts.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD as Appendix E and Appendix F, as a part of my remarks, two statements, one showing the result of operation of the roads in 1917, compared with 1918, in each district, the rate of return upon the value of the property in the district as a whole, and the percentage in increase of freight rates necessary to enable the roads in the whole district to pay 6 per cent upon their value, taking the cost as the value of the railroads.

I did not use 5½ per cent because it is easier to make these figures on the basis of 6 per cent, those calculations having been made many times, but Senators can see that by reducing them a certain percentage it would be easier to arrive at a different basis.

The other is the same statement for the nine months of the year 1919, the balance of the year estimated. It will thus be seen that in New England it would take 28.06 per cent increase in freight rates, assuming the same amount of business is handled as at present; in the central district, 15.73 per cent; in the southern district, 19.94 per cent; in the western district, which includes all railroads west of the Mississippi River—in fact west of Chicago and St. Louis—15.04 per cent. The western district is divided into three territories, viz, the transcontinental territory, which embraces all the principal lines running from the Mississippi River to the Pacific, the southwestern territory, and the western territory. The southwestern district would require an increase in freight rates of 28.05 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean 28.05 per cent in excess of the present prevailing rate?

Mr. KELLOGG. Twenty-eight and one-half per cent in excess of the present prevailing rate, assuming there is the same amount of business. I do not intend to intimate that that can or should be effected, certainly not immediately.

These figures have, of course, been made up on the basis of present freight earnings and do not contemplate an increase of passenger rates. I am satisfied that no increase in passenger rates can be made. Of course, as I say, the percentage is higher than would be required to earn 5½ per cent or a little over 5 per cent, which the pending bill provides for.

The question of minimum guaranty and excess earnings: The most difficult problem confronting the committee was this: Owing to the wide variation in the earning capacity of different roads in the same district, how could a rate be made—which must, of course, be the same on all roads—which would pay a fair return to the poorer roads and not yield excessive earnings to better roads? In fact, when this problem is solved all of the others will prove easy, and weeks of time and the opinions of the best experts in America were sought on this question.

Many plans were discussed, but finally the question resolved itself into two propositions: First, to make rates in each transportation district so as to produce revenue to pay the operating expenses, including the wages of labor and the cost of maintenance, a fair return upon the property, and to insure the investment of capital necessary to enable the carriers to adequately perform their duties to the public, and let each individual railroad, under this arrangement, earn what it could.

The second was to make rates which would yield 5½ per cent on the aggregate value of the property in each district, with authority of the commission to allow, in its discretion, one-half of 1 per cent more for nonproductive improvements, betterments, or equipment, and as to each individual road earning more than 6 per cent of the value of its property and not exceeding 7 per cent, one half of such excess is to go into its individual sinking fund, and the other half into a general sinking fund for the benefit of all roads.

I should explain that that belongs to the Government, of course, and though loaned to the railroads it still is a debt due the Government. Of all excess earnings above 7 per cent, one-fourth is to go into the individual sinking fund and three-fourths into the general sinking fund. The individual sinking fund is to be kept by each road and to be drawn upon for the purpose of paying interest and dividends whenever its individual income shall fall below 6 per cent. When this sinking fund shall equal 5 per cent of the value of the property the railroad company is to have one-third of all excess above 6 per cent, and two-thirds is to be paid into the general sinking fund, to be held and owned by the Government. The general sinking fund is to be invested under the authority of the board of transportation, to be used in the way of purchases, leases, or rental of transportation equipment and facilities or loans to carriers.

The question is, Which of these two plans is the best? I am prepared to support this bill, although it does not, in all respects, meet my judgment. It is the consensus of the opinion of the entire committee. Nevertheless, I deem it my duty to lay before the Senate the result of my experience and observation in railroad operations.

While there have been in the past, more especially in the earlier years of the development of our railroad systems, great abuses, such as overcapitalization and the payment of rebates, these abuses have been stopped. Since 1907 the Interstate Commerce Commission has kept accurate accounts of the annual money invested in railroad property, rebates have been eliminated, and the railroads are now being valued by the United States, and it is the purpose of this bill to place the issuance of securities entirely in the hands of the commission. But what has made our railroad systems great and developed the vast resources of this country? It has been individual enterprise and competition. Competition in every walk of life has been the mainspring of human progress, and while I realize perfectly that there can not be great competition in rates without discrimination, and that rates must be the same to all, yet there is great competition in service, in enterprise, in operation, in inventive genius, in labor-saving and life-saving improvements, and in betterment of service. It would not be possible to entirely equalize the earning capacity of all railroads and to coordinate the fields of individual enterprise without stagnation.

Of course, this bill does not seek to exactly equalize the earnings of all railroads. One road was wisely built as to territory, grades, and manner of construction, and is economically operated, or it was constructed in the early days and developed with the growth of the country. Another road was unwisely built for speculative purposes and is not economically operated. While it is undoubtedly necessary that it must continue to operate, it is neither fair nor just nor economically sound that the earnings of the better road should be taken and given to the poorer road. It is in direct conflict with all principles of fair dealing and would discourage enterprise, which is necessary to the progress of all human affairs.

Of course, it is fair to say that the bill before the Senate does not take from one road and give to another. It takes a part of the excess earnings, a part of what is supposed to be above a reasonable earning, and turns it over to the Government and provides that the Government may use it in the aid of the transportation systems of the country.

It was thought by the committee that fair rates could not be maintained which would establish the credit and maintain the railroads of the United States without producing to certain of those roads so great an income that it would be unfair to the public, and therefore a certain percentage of those earnings is taken and turned over to the United States, so that it may be used to loan to carriers for purposes of equipment or for acquiring additional facilities, but it belongs to the United States, as the Senator from Iowa stated.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The presumption is, I understand, that whatever earnings railroads may make, those earnings are made under regulations which are supposed to be reasonable and which provide that their earnings shall only be reasonable. The contention of the Senator and the pending bill therefore reach this ground, namely, that you deprive the railroad companies of their earnings, earnings which are supposed to be reasonable, or, rather, which are based upon reasonable rates, and you confiscate those earnings and give them to the weaker roads. Is not that the effect, legally and morally, of the proposed legislation?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if there is any question in his mind as to the constitutionality of that provision?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer both questions together. I have given a great deal of attention to the question of the constitutionality of that provision. I have read the opinion of Hon. Elihu Root; Mr. John G. Milburn, of New York; Mr. John S. Miller, of Chicago; Mr. Johnson, of Atlanta; and many others, that it is constitutional. I have read the opinion of Mr. Thom, who is a very able lawyer, and of ex-Justice Hughes, of the Supreme Court, to the effect that it is unconstitutional. After studying the question as carefully as I could I have come to the conclusion that it is constitutional; and I base my judgment on the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am not going to stop to review them; but the Government has the right to regulate the earnings of public-utility companies engaged in interstate commerce. It can not, of course, restrict those earnings below a point that would yield a fair return upon the investment, but within that sphere, allowing a fair return upon the investment, the regulation may be effectuated by fixing reasonable rates or by fixing a reasonable income.

As stated by the chairman of the committee, if there was but one railroad in the United States and Congress should come to the conclusion that 6 per cent or 7 per cent upon the value of its property was a fair return, Congress could so provide and allow it to make rates as it pleased, taking the balance, or Congress could fix rates which would produce 6 or 7 per cent. Can it be less within the power of Congress if there are a hundred railroads? Of course, Congress can not say to the Great Western Railroad that it shall accept 1 per cent, but it can fix a standard of earnings which will allow the fair return on all the properties in a district. If one railroad does not wish to accept it, it can go into court; but its competitor is bound to take it, and therefore it could not get any more.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are the earnings of railroads the property of the companies?

Mr. KELLOGG. The earnings of the railroads are undoubtedly the property of the companies.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under this bill are they the property of the companies?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. And if the Government fixes the just earnings of a railroad at 6 per cent and they make 7 per cent, then the earnings over 6 per cent belong to that railroad; yet the Senator contends that the Government can take away from the railroads their property and use it as it determines for other railroads.

Mr. KELLOGG. This bill does not propose to give the roads the right to earn all they please. It proposes to fix a standard of earnings above which the Congress provides the return shall be unreasonable.

Mr. OVERMAN. But when the Senator from Minnesota admits that the earnings of the railroads are the property of the railroads, the Government by this action would be taking away the property of the railroads without due process of law.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact, if the Senator from Minnesota will permit me, that this bill does not take the property of the railroads?

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator from Minnesota says that the earnings are the property of the railroads. Having admitted they are the property of the railroads, what right has the Government to take them away from the railroads?

Mr. WATSON. But the return over and above the standard return becomes the property of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then it resolves itself into a question of whether it is the property of the railroads?

Mr. WATSON. We have undertaken to provide in this bill that the excess earnings do not become the property of the railroads.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is where the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Indiana differ.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, no; I misunderstood the Senator from North Carolina. I stated that ordinarily, under the law as it now exists, if a rate is fixed and a railroad earns more than 6 per cent, the excess belongs to the railroad; but that does not prohibit Congress adopting the earnings as the basis for the regulation of the roads and providing that earnings above a certain amount shall not belong to the railroads. That is the point I wish to make.

I believe that to be constitutional—I am aware of the fact that eminent lawyers will disagree with me—but the question of its wisdom, of course, is entirely another thing. I am aware of the fact that there is much question in the minds of many men as to whether such a provision is wise, and, to be perfectly frank with the Senate, when the matter was discussed before the committee I thought that some other plan would be better in order to maintain the initiative and the enterprise of the railroads of the United States, but the majority of the committee disagreed with me. It may be, in order to stabilize securities and put the railroads upon a financial basis where they can handle all the business of the country without excessive charges being placed upon the people, that it is better to adopt this provision.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, is it not a fact that this entire difficulty, if there be a difficulty, results by reason of the law which compels a uniformity of rates? That is to say, if we made a rate for the Pennsylvania Railroad alone, and there were no other railroad in the country, we could provide rates, fares, and charges that would give a return that would be equivalent to 5½ per cent on the invested capital. We are, however, compelled to make uniform rates for all of the competing lines in the same rate district. If we were making a rate for the Baltimore & Ohio Road alone, we could, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, make rates and charges that would bring a return equivalent to 5½ per cent on the investment of that line; but inasmuch as rates must be uniform in the same district, if we fix a rate that will earn 5½ per cent for the Baltimore & Ohio investment, that of necessity would bring a return of 6 or 7 per cent on the investment of the Pennsylvania Line.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] contended the other day that the excess might be taken from one rate-making district and applied to another rate-making district—for example, to the southern district or to the California district—so as to assist in bringing about a uniformity of rates.

Mr. WATSON. But it is to go into a fund, and that fund is at the disposition of Congress.

Mr. DIAL. Does not the bill penalize the well-managed roads?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not. As I explained a while ago, and I will explain again to the Senator, if we were fixing a rate for one road alone we could provide for a return of 5½ per cent on the invested capital, but inasmuch as rates must be uniform and one road may make more than 5½ per cent we have a right to put all of them on the rate-making basis or the earning basis, if you please, of 5½ per cent on the invested capital, and say we will take the excess and put it into a fund to be disposed of by Congress for the benefit of all the roads; that is, a portion of it, the other portion, going into a fund for the benefit of the particular road which makes it by way of dividends or improvements or betterments.

Mr. DIAL. I have no well-defined idea about it, but it seems to me that it is not rewarding industry, and that when a rate is fixed it ought to be uniform and let the roads make what they can above the minimum return.

Saturday, December 6, 1919.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday we were discussing the constitutionality of the provision taking away part of the excess earnings of certain roads. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] evidently misunderstood what I said. As the law now stands, of course, but for Government control and operation whatever a railroad earns above the standard return belongs to it. That, however, does not militate against the position that the Government may change the basis of regulation and may provide a standard of earnings for public-service corporations, in which event a railroad would not have any property right in the earnings above the standard return fixed by the Government. That is the whole proposition. I think it is constitutional; the wisdom of it is entirely another question. As to that, undoubtedly, men who are familiar with the subject and students of railway operation may differ.

I was of the opinion, when the committee took up the question, that it would be better to have a simple rule of rate making; to provide that the railroads, as a whole, in a district should be entitled to earn a fair return, and that every road should keep what it earned, but after long discussion a majority of the committee concluded this provision to be wise, and I am not prepared to say that the committee is not right. In any event it will stabilize railroad securities; it will, undoubtedly, enable the roads to procure a fair return on the value of their property without any particular line of road obtaining more than a fair return; and if it leaves enough of the earnings with the individual road to encourage it to better its service, I think it will prove an acceptable and wise provision. The only question in my mind is whether it will work out in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the Senator's views on this proposition: Is there any danger under that kind of a provision in the law of encouraging extravagance on the part of the railroads? In other words, if the excess of their returns above a certain fixed figure must go to the Government, would there be any incentive, as the Senator says, to go ahead and improve their service? Taking the best roads, so long as they felt that they were going to get only a certain return in any event, would there be any incentive to improve the roads?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Nebraska must remember that the only provision which bears any relation to a guaranty is that the rates shall be made as nearly as possible to yield 5½ per cent on the value of the property. Of course, as I shall be able to show the Senator in a moment, this bill does not provide for a 5½ per cent return, but if a road earns more than 6 per cent it gets one-half between that and 7 per cent, and above 7 per cent it gets one-quarter. I am inclined to think that may be insufficient to encourage competition between the roads. No man can tell exactly how it will operate, but I should not think it would tend to encourage extravagance or wastefulness. I may say that I still have some doubt about the wisdom of it.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may ask another question along the same line in regard to this surplus, would there be anything in the theory that this surplus, if it is made, above what is fixed as the return on reasonable rates is in fact money that belongs to the consumers, to the shippers, to the people, and that the taking of more than a reasonable rate is unfair to them?

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, the Senator must remember that the Government takes this balance and the entire public gets the benefit of it.

Mr. NORRIS. How does the whole public get the benefit of it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Railroad facilities must be provided by some one, money must be borrowed for those facilities, and the Government simply takes the surplus and becomes, it might be said, the banker for the railroads; the Government owns it and the public gets the benefit of it.

Mr. NORRIS. The money is used, or at least a great portion of it is used, is it not, to help out the weaker roads; and, if that is true, does not the bill apply the same principle to the weaker roads that is applied to the stronger roads; that is, it gives them the right to get more money than the value of their property based on a fair return would give them?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not given to the weaker roads; that is the point; it is loaned to them. The Government gets its return and the public gets the benefit of it, as I understand the bill. It is for the very reason mentioned by the Senator that I was opposed to the consolidation of all the lines in the country into one railroad system. That would equalize their earning capacity, of course, and it would permit rates to be made to produce exactly the same return on all the railroad property in the United States; but I was opposed to it and opposed to Government ownership, because it destroys the very initiative and competition which must exist if the public is to enjoy an efficient system of railroads. Show me a place in this country where there is good railroad service and I will show you a place where there is keen competition, and there is not a place in the United States where there is not competition that the railroad service is satisfactory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator's statement that a remedy for the difficulty suggested would be the organization of all the railroads into one corporation under one control interests me very much. I take it if that could be done it would solve this difficulty that everybody admits is the great one. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is, if the committee wanted to avoid Government ownership did they in their investigation consider the plan of organizing all the railroads under one system rather than under several systems with a view to obviating that difficult without entering upon Government ownership?

Mr. KELLOGG. The committee were of the opinion—and I am very firmly of the opinion—that we might just as well have Government ownership. If you consolidate all the railroads in the United States into one corporation, you will deaden every incentive to enterprise, to competition, to efficiency, and will have made it necessary to have a great central bureau to manage 260,000 miles of railroad, which can not be done. I would prefer to leave them as they are and let every road struggle for what it can get, even though some roads should not survive, rather than to bring about that condition in this country; in fact, I think we might just as well have Government ownership.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not, after all, just a difference in the size of the corporation?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator will find, I think, that a railroad can be too large to be efficiently managed; and that is why I am not in favor of having all the railroads put into one corporation or into great regional corporations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to say so, it seems to me that we have, in effect, now one great corporation operating, or perhaps I had better more correctly say attempting to operate, 260,000 miles of railroad. I say, as a result of a year's study of this problem, that there has never been in the history of the railroads of this country as much extravagance and inefficiency as there has been under this unified control, no matter what the merits may have been; and there have been merits in the unified operation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall try to proceed rapidly, because I do not wish to take too much time.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day questioned the basis of comparison of earnings of different railroads made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the ground that the book valuation was not a fair valuation. It does not make any difference what basis you take. We are faced with the proposition that it is necessary to make rates that will enable all of the principal lines of railroads of the country to live. I do not mean that they should all earn the same rate of return on their investment.

It would not be fair that they should do so, because the Chicago Great Western ought not to earn as much as the Burlington, or the Western Pacific as much as the Union Pacific; but there is a great divergence in the earning capacity of different roads, which makes it most difficult to adjust rates that are not too high and permit all of the railroads to live; and it was for that reason that the majority of the committee finally concluded that this was the best policy.

There are, of course, many considerations which support that view. I shall not attempt to go into all of them; but let me illustrate this variation of earnings, and I will take another basis, not the one used by the Senator from Iowa.

During the nine months to September 30, 1919, in the eastern district between Chicago and New York and north of the Ohio River, the Baltimore & Ohio had a deficit of $13,394,762. That is, it lacked that amount in earning its fixed charges, without any dividends on stock, while the New York Central earned a surplus over its fixed charges of $2,371,808. The Erie had a deficit of $10,889,077, while the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, its competitor, had a surplus of $3,192,520. These are extreme illustrations in this district.

Mr. POMERENE. That was last year?

Mr. KELLOGG. That was the first nine months of this year, and is a fair illustration of what the year will show. In the western district the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul had a deficit of $11,466,252, while the Union Pacific had a surplus of $17,189,129.

Mr. STERLING. Was that for the like period?

Mr. KELLOGG. Exactly the same period—the first nine months of this year. The Southern Pacific had a deficit of $13,088,404, while the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe had a surplus of $13,439,073. The Chicago Great Western had a deficit of $299,629, while the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy had a surplus of $12,202,572. I think myself that those variations are more than would exist in ordinary times, but there is no use disguising the fact that 108 of the railroads of the United States to-day lack $60,000,000 a year in earning their interest, and only 57 of them earned more than their interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator means 108 of the class 1 roads?

Mr. KELLOGG. The class 1 roads. I do not mean little roads. The class 1 roads are those earning more than a million dollars gross; and the committee was confronted with the realization that it would be an appalling thing for 108 railroads to go into the hands of a receiver in six months. We could not fix a basis of rates in this country which would support all of those 108 railroads and not give the 57 a good deal more than the public interest would permit. That is why I was induced to consent to the report of this bill, which in some respects runs counter to my long-established economic ideas. I wished to save the railroad systems of this country from utter bankruptcy, because railroad efficiency is needed on every farm and in every village and in every single industry that exists in the country; and I doubt if Senators realize the serious condition confronting the country. I do not care what basis of value you take; I will take the valuation fixed by any board in the world that is fair. The railroads to-day are not earning anywhere near 4 per cent upon their value.

Mr. WATSON. What per cent of them are not earning enough to pay dividends?

Mr. KELLOGG. One hundred and eight roads out of 165 are not earning their interest and fixed charges, to say nothing about dividends, and all the railroads of the United States are lacking $60,000,000 of earning their interest and fixed charges, with not a dollar for dividends; and everyone knows, of course, that the bonded indebtedness of the roads is far below, six or seven billions below, any valuation which will be placed upon them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, are there not some that are not even earning their operating expenses?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes; many of them. The list appears in the RECORD.

Mr. CAPPER. How different is that from the prewar condition in this country?

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the prewar condition, the last year before the war, 60.38 per cent of the class 1 railroads were paying dividends, and practically all of the railroads were earning their interest. Of course, there were some poor lines which were not earning their interest, and some in the hands of receivers, which is a condition that always does exist. The roads for the three years before the war earned an average of 5.25 per cent upon their book values.

As I said, I do not favor this economic principle. I have many times thought that it would be better to give a fair return on all the property and let every road keep what it could get, because, after all, it is what are known as the rich roads that have to borrow the most money and buy the most equipment and terminals; but the committee thought otherwise, and there are, as I have said, some very strong reasons that make it imperative that the securities should be stabilized.

I realize that rates should not be made which will furnish the poorer lines 4 per cent or 5½ per cent or 6 per cent on the value of their properties. They are not worth it. They can not earn it under normal conditions of rates and traffic and should receive less than lines more fortunately situated with larger traffic. If the plan of the committee is to be adopted—and, as I said, I am prepared to support it—I think a sufficient percentage on the earnings above the 6 per cent should be left with the road producing the same, to encourage economical operation and good service. And I doubt very much if one-half of the increase between 6 per cent and 7 per cent and above that is sufficient. My own judgment would be to give them half of all they receive over and above 6 per cent, but I am not insistent upon it.

The plan which the majority of the committee thought best gives the roads, as I said, 5½ per cent upon the value of their property, with one-half of 1 per cent more, if the commission should so determine, for nonproductive betterments, improvements, or equipment. As to the last proposition, railroads are required to make a great amount of improvements from earnings which are called nonproductive improvements. This is a misnomer, and if the present clause in the bill should be retained that word should be stricken out, because no one can say that an improvement is entirely nonproductive.

Steel bridges in place of wooden bridges, stone culverts in place of wooden culverts, street elevations, new stations, and many other improvements which the public demand and to which they are entitled will pay little, if any, income on the investment. But no one can say they are entirely nonproductive. I do not believe that one-half per cent is sufficient among the roads as a whole in this country for such improvements. The best estimate I have been able to obtain is that prior to Government operation the railroads of this country, for 10 years, had spent about three-fourths of 1 per cent per annum as a whole. I mean three-fourths of 1 per cent on the value as it appears on their books, which is about 18 billions. Of course, the best roads, which had the money to spend, invested much more than this. Some invested as high as 3 per cent, but undoubtedly the average was at least three-fourths of 1 per cent.

Now, it must be remembered that they have spent much more than this in betterments and improvements. The average for five years before the war was about $446,000,000, but it is not all taken out of earnings. It is impossible to borrow all the money that goes into betterments and improvements, because they yield such a small per cent of income, if any at all, that you are constantly increasing capital, on which you have to pay interest if you borrow the money. If it is paid in the form of rates, the public has the benefit of it, for under this bill it is not proposed that that money shall ever at any time draw any interest, or pay any income to the railroads, or be the basis of rates to pay any income. That half of 1 per cent does not belong to the railroads. It is not given to the railroads. It is taken from earnings and put into betterments and improvements. Of course, it would make the railroad property more valuable, but it never can be used under this bill, and never should be used, as a basis for earning in the future. Upon that principle the committee was unanimous, and I think it is one of the best principles in this bill. I have for years advocated that principle when we could have the railroads valued and get a basis upon which to act.

The next question is whether the 5½ per cent is too great an income for the roads. The chairman of the committee said that he was inclined to think that it was larger than it should be.

Mr. POMERENE. That is on the whole valuation.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is on the whole. The Senate must remember that this takes in entire traffic districts and involves the entire value of the railroad property. It is not the book value, it is not the capitalized value; it is the value which the Interstate Commerce Commission shall from time to time fix. They have the facilities and information so they can very accurately fix that value before their complete valuation is available.

But you must remember that while, of course, 5½ per cent on the value of that property at present will enable some of the railroads to pay dividends greater than 5½ per cent, railroad bonds in the future will draw a higher rate of interest than they have in the past.

Take the value of money to-day. Bank credits, the best in the world, pay 6 per cent. Government bonds exempt from all State and Federal taxation except surtaxes pay all the way from 4 to 4.75, and State and municipal securities which are exempt from all taxation, both State and Federal, are paying from 4½ to 5 per cent. Of course, no one would invest in railroad securities, subject to uncertainties, unless the stock at least will yield a good deal more than 5½ per cent. To-day no one could possibly sell a railroad stock, and the bonds have depreciated on an average of 25 to 30 per cent in the last five years. The Government itself is now charging the railroads 6 per cent, and in this very bill the railroads are funding their indebtedness to the Government for 10 years, with a provision that they shall give a first mortgage bond, if it is possible, and if not possible such security as the President shall demand, and the Government is charging them 6 per cent per annum. And yet some people criticize us because they say we are permitting the owners of the roads to earn 5½ per cent on the value of their property.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest in this connection that notwithstanding the fact that the Government is charging 6 per cent interest on the indebtedness of these railroads to the Government, yet we have Mr. Plumb, representing the brotherhoods, going around over the country and insisting that if the country were to buy up the railroads and operate them under a scheme of Government ownership, it could be done on a 4 per cent basis?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, you could no more sell a Government bond to-day, even exempt from taxation, to the extent of $17,000,000,000, bearing 4 per cent, I was going to say, than you could sell a railroad stock. It could not be done.

Again, it must be remembered that 5½ per cent to-day is not equal to 5½ per cent five years ago. The great inflation of currency and the general rise in prices on all commodities have made a dollar very much less in purchasing power. Another thing should be borne in mind: This bill does not give the railroads 5½ per cent on the value of all railroad property in the United States. It provides that the commission shall fix rates which shall, as near as possible, allow 5½ per cent on the aggregate value of all the railroads in each traffic district. But if any one road receives more than 6 per cent, a part is to be taken over and become the property of the Government, and it is estimated—and I think with great accuracy—by the best expert that this will only leave to the railroads 5½ per cent on the value of their property. The balance is taken over to the Government. So that even the 5½ per cent is not guaranteed the railroads.

When we realize that this can not all be paid out in dividends and interest, but a part of it must be used for betterments and improvements, I am convinced it will be found that the rate of return is not too much, indeed if it is not inadequate.

Some have advocated that the Government guarantee 4 per cent on all railroad securities, and make the rates so as to produce this amount, and take all the earnings in excess of the same. But when the Government has to sell a 4¾ per cent bond at par, exempt from taxation, is it reasonable to suppose that it could sell railroad securities, subject to State and Federal taxation, for 5 per cent or even 5½ per cent? And I for one will never consent to exempt $17,000,000,000 or $18,000,000,000 worth of railroad securities from State taxation.

All these railroad securities are subject to State taxation and Federal income taxation. What would be said if the Congress undertook to guarantee railroads 4 per cent, 4½ per cent, or 5 per cent and exempted all their securities and property from taxation by the States? It can not be done and never ought to be done. They should be subject to local taxation.

I think the Government would save but little, if anything, by guaranteeing all the railroad securities of the country directly. It would destroy, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said, all incentive for the railroads to try to make adequate earnings through good service to the public.

There are undoubtedly many considerations in favor of the plan in this bill. The minimum would insure the solvency of most of the roads and enable them to pay their fixed charges, and the maximum is sufficiently large to leave some incentive to better operation. Whether it is enough I can not tell. One thing is certain—enormous sums of money must immediately be obtained for the purchase of equipment and the furnishing of additional railroad facilities, or the business of this country will suffer beyond redemption.

There is no way to get the public to put money into the railroads except to make their securities safe and attractive. You may reduce the rate of return to the present owners to any basis which the Constitution will permit, but you can not make a man invest in railroad securities, and from half a billion to a billion dollars must go into the railroads of this country every year from now on, or the public must suffer. There are only two ways of doing it. You must make them safe or the Government must buy them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator if he has compared the ratio of losses that the railroads were sustaining when they were taken over by the Government with the ratio of losses now? In other words, is the annual loss greater now than it was prior to the time the Government took the railroads over, and is it becoming greater?

Mr. KELLOGG. I put all that in the RECORD yesterday; but I will say for the benefit of the Senator that when the Government took over the roads the class 1 roads were earning an average for the three years of about $905,000,000. They are now earning a little over half of that. The Government is losing about $350,000,000 a year, and the railroads are not earning, as a whole, the interest on their bonds.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is the greater loss which they sustain now due to the increased cost of operation or due to the fact that the roads are not getting as much business as they did prior to the war?

Mr. KELLOGG. The business of 1918 was a little larger than the business of 1917. The business of 1919 is not quite as large as the business of 1917 or 1918. But the business is large to-day. The loss is due to increased operating expenses. I went into the details of that yesterday, and the Senator will find it in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sorry I could not be here to hear the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. It is due also to inefficiency.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, Mr. President, just one word about the transportation board.

The bill creates a transportation board to study the general transportation problem and to perform many of the executive duties of the commission, leaving the commission to deal largely with the question of rates, earnings of roads, and valuation of properties. One of the weaknesses of the commission in the past has been that it has acted both as an executive and quasi judicial body. It should resemble a judicial body as nearly as possible, as far removed from political influence as can be, and its executive duties ought to be performed by another branch of the service. I do not know that a board of five members is necessary. I am inclined to think three would be better.

If this consolidation plan is adopted, and an opportunity is given to study the water and rail transportation and to coordinate them, a good deal of work must be performed by the board, and in this regard I am prepared to support that provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota something he may have for the moment forgotten. One of the considerations which led the committee to make the board of five persons instead of three was that the board of transportation has the final word upon disputes between employers and employees, and it was thought safer to have a larger board to deal with that very important question.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true; and for the moment it had slipped my mind. I did not intend, however, to discuss the transportation board, as it was fully discussed by the Senator from Iowa, and I fully indorse his views on the subject.

One of the important features of this bill is the plan of railway consolidation, and it contains two propositions: First, permissive consolidation; and, second, compulsory consolidation at the end of seven years.

On the general principle of consolidations I am of the opinion that much can be gained by the amalgamation of the lines of road into the principal competitive systems of the United States.

There seems to be some misunderstanding by some Senators. This bill does not propose to create regional railroads at all. It proposes to take all of the principal lines of competitive transportation and maintain them as they are, taking in a vast number of smaller lines which may be said to constitute feeders, many of which are weak lines, such as the Minneapolis & St. Louis, the Chicago & Great Western, and many others throughout the country that I could name. The committee felt as though there were some 20 or 35 of these principal competitive lines, though I doubt if there are 35. But this consolidation should not be permitted to the extent of depriving the country generally of competition in the service and in permitting the construction of lines of road to meet the growing conditions of the country. I am in favor of requiring a railroad company, before it undertakes to construct any considerable system of road or extension of its road, to obtain a certificate of public necessity, but this should not be done to the extent of repressing enterprise, but only to the extent of preventing useless duplication of roads built for speculative purposes. Many of the principal roads of the country have been constructed by people opening up and developing new industries where the old lines of railroad did not care to risk the investment. And that enterprise should be left so that if one wishes to open a mine, a manufactory, or a new agricultural district, he may build his own railroad, or some other system may build it. If you consolidate them all into a regional district, you have ended enterprise; and that is why the committee did not deem it wise to do so.

Hundreds of millions of dollars to-day are invested in such roads, which are prosperous, and which were constructed by individuals and corporations engaged in the industry of this country. Consolidation should only be permitted along the lines of natural competitive transportation. Let me illustrate what the bill proposes to do. Take the district west of the Mississippi River or west of Chicago, running from Chicago to St. Louis, down the Mississippi River, and all the country west thereof. There are 10 principal lines of railroad—the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Burlington, Union Pacific, North Western, Southern Pacific, Santa Fe, the Missouri Pacific—known as the Gould System—the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie.

I think that takes in all of the principal lines of competitive transportation. There are many other small roads, some of them quite large systems, but, as to every one of them, all of the territory which those systems occupy is adequately served and competition furnished by the larger systems.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will permit me, I think there was some confusion caused in the minds of some Senators by reason of the fact that certain rate districts were provided in the bill, and, further, that certain corporations were provided for; and Senators were inclined to believe that the corporations were to be regional or district corporations, resulting in district operation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have already explained what are known as traffic districts, and I will say just a word about reincorporation.

It must be remembered that there is a limit as to size beyond which you can not have efficient management, and I would not permit this limit to be reached or the principal competitive lines to be consolidated beyond it. There are some lines which could undoubtedly be salvaged—part of the Western Pacific, between Salt Lake and San Francisco, which is utterly useless, both for competition and local service. But, generally speaking, the competitive systems of the country should and must be maintained. It is not practicable to say that they can be scrapped or sold. No one will buy them unless they will pay operating expenses and something upon the capital invested. No other company would buy a road if it did not earn its operating expenses. You can not tear up the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul system, nor the Chicago Great Western, nor the Erie. As the Senator from Iowa said, you would create a storm that no other act affecting industry in this country would cause. It can not be done, and they must be maintained.

It is proposed to permit this consolidation only on a basis not exceeding actual value found by the commission. To be sure, if a road wishes to sell out for less than its value, it is to the advantage of the public, and I see no reason why it should be prohibited. There are many of these lines of road which are not worth what they cost. Their securities are selling on a basis far below their physical value, and I see no reason why, if they wish to sell out to a larger system, they should not take somewhere near the market value instead of the physical value if they are willing to do so. These consolidations are to be made after study by the transportation board, and this is one of the most important duties of that board.

Even though we conceded the right of a road to sell out to another, it should not be permitted until some board has found that it will not unnecessarily or unduly suppress competition to which the public is entitled, and that is one of the objects of the board.

This permissive consolidation is permitted under the following plan: If two or three roads wish to consolidate, they may do so on the basis of value found by the commission, provided they do not unduly suppress competition. They may file a charter with the Federal Government reincorporating them as a Federal entity, giving them all the power that they now have under their State charters, but simply making them a reincorporated Federal company. That is substantially the way the banks reincorporated during the Civil War. That is the permissive system. That goes on for seven years. It is manifestly impossible to have any compulsory system at present.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I remark there, simply that it may not escape the attention of Senators, that even that consolidation must have the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It must find that it is in the public interest.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, certainly. No consolidation of competing lines of railroads can be made under the bill or should be made unless the board or the Interstate Commerce Commission find that it is in the public interest.

As to the compulsory consolidation, I must admit again that I personally did not think it necessary or wise, although, as I shall point out, it has some features which are greatly in the public interest.

The substance of this plan of compulsory consolidation is that the transportation board, after making its general plan of consolidation and permitting consolidations to occur during the first seven years, will then proceed to enforce a complete system of consolidation into not less than 20 nor more than 35 companies.

The capitalization of the consolidated companies in stock and bonds shall not exceed the value of the property ascertained by the commission under the act of March 1, 1913. This is to be accomplished through a Federal charter and condemnation proceedings. The board is authorized to organize a railroad company to take over any lines that it is desirous of consolidating. The modus operandi would be to organize the corporation and to condemn the properties of the companies thus to be consolidated, and then to issue and to sell new securities to pay for the properties so condemned. I know of no other legal way to compel such consolidation, and the bill provides that the same is not to be made until sufficient securities have been sold to pay for the properties thus taken. I think the Government has the power to compel consolidation by the system of condemnation.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment, though I am sorry to do so?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is power in the board for the exchange or substitution of securities, and it is believed by those who favor the plan that the power of eminent domain will not have to be resorted to in very many instances.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, I perhaps should have remarked that if the board comes to the conclusion that there should be a consolidation of certain lines of railroad it may deal with the railroads thus to be consolidated and exchange securities in the new corporation for those of the old, and if behind this proposed consolidation there is power to enforce it, I have no doubt that most of them could be accomplished. In fact, it is my opinion that we will never use this system of enforceable consolidation, and that it will never be necessary to employ it.

Mr. CAPPER. Does the Senator think the carriers generally are in favor of this consolidation feature?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think they are generally in favor of it. I have, however, heard many carriers say that they did not believe in the principle of enforceable consolidation.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I probably have had more conferences with the executives on that point than the Senator from Minnesota, possibly I can answer that question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, better than I can.

Mr. CUMMINS. The railroad companies are, of course, desirous of having such a law as will permit voluntary consolidation; naturally they are; but so far as I know they are quite opposed to the compulsory consolidation feature, and that is just as natural as the former. Whenever the Government tries to do anything with a railway company against its will, it always meets opposition, and it has met it in this particular case.

I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that in all probability during the seven years allowed for permissive or voluntary consolidation the plan which we have proposed in the bill will be worked out; I think it will be substantially completed; but I believe it only because that after seven years there is power given in the bill to the Government to compel the consolidation which the transportation board and the Interstate Commerce Commission may have determined upon.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator from Iowa is quite right, although I was of the impression that, generally speaking, railroad executives believed that the companies should be consolidated into the present principal competitive lines. They are very much opposed to consolidating the big lines of road into one company.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite of their opinion in that regard. I think the consolidations must take place along the lines already established, and the bill expressly provides for that.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does.

Mr. CUMMINS. For instance, if we were consolidating the roads between New York and Chicago, no one would suggest that they should be consolidated into less than five systems. Those we have had before us have always indicated that that plan, as a general rule, ought to be followed; that will give competition to every community that has it now; and that will recognize the great trunk lines which now exist. That will be true of the West, as the Senator from Minnesota has said, just as it is true of the East.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not wish to be understood as objecting to that at all. In fact, I think the consolidation must take place along those lines and in the principal companies which are now competing for the traffic of the country, because the country has developed with the construction of those natural competitive lines of transportation, not only competitive between the railroads but competitive between great manufacturing and agricultural and producing districts, so that Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, Minneapolis, St. Paul, and New York are all competing throughout the United States for the business of the country. These natural lines of competitive transportation have developed with the country, and it is and must be the object of the bill to maintain that competitive transportation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to make merely a brief statement as a predicate for the question which I am about to propound?

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to finish as soon as possible; I am nearly through, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Whether he finds any legal impediment to the consummation of the plan of involuntary consolidation suggested by the bill? The Senator knows that under the authorities a charter for a corporation is a contract between the State and the corporation, and that the stock and bonds which are issued and held by stockholders or by the public constitute property. Some railroad stocks and bonds represent holdings in very valuable and profitable companies. Enforced consolidation will compel individuals to surrender stocks and bonds which they own in corporations which are profitable, and will compel them to take stock or bonds in some consolidated company.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], sotto voce, says no. I suppose he means by that that the power of eminent domain will be invoked and those individuals will be paid in cash for their holdings, and they will not take stock and bonds; but the point I am trying to get at is this: Does the Senator think that it is entirely constitutional to compel these corporations existing now under State laws—some of them being profitable—to disincorporate and come in under Federal charters and to dispose of their holdings to some other corporation?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not think it would be constitutional to do that, nor do I think any such thing is intended. The power of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution is supreme——

Mr. KING. It is supreme to regulate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Except as it is limited by provisions of the Constitution against taking private property without due process of law and in regard to the protection of personal and property rights, the means by which that regulation is to be carried out is entirely in the judgment of the Congress. Under the Constitution its power is supreme over all the power of the States. I have, therefore, no doubt of the constitutional power of the Federal Government, first, to take over all the railroads, to condemn them, and to pay for them and liquidate all stocks and bonds; and, second, to sell them to private ownership, for if the Government may buy it may also sell. I should doubt the power of the Congress simply to direct the consolidation of lines of railroad now existing without some such machinery.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota also that in addition to the power to regulate commerce the Federal Government has the power to establish post offices and post roads?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; the power in that respect, of course, is plenary, so far as the commerce clause of the Constitution is concerned.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will pardon me for just one moment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; though I have not yet answered the Senator's question in full.

Mr. KING. Excuse me.

Mr. KELLOGG. There might be some question with regard to authorizing a railroad to take over a competitor line as a whole while the competitor is owned by private individuals, its stockholders; and it may be that there may be difficulty in working out this proposition by reason of the fact that the Government must obtain the money with which to pay for the roads before they can be consolidated; in other words, that the stock, bonds, or securities of the consolidating companies must be sold and the money procured in order to pay for the properties before they are condemned.

It may be said that if the Government sells the securities before the properties are condemned it therefore is not the owner of the corporation condemned. That, I should think, is the only legal question involved in that case at all. The power, however, of course, is ample; and if this bill is unworkable in that regard, Congress has the power to change it. There is no doubt about the power of Congress to condemn two railroads, combine them, and sell their securities.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. The statement just made by the Senator is a pretty broad one. I wonder if the Senator means that that shall also apply to roads whose business and whose lines are wholly intrastate, whose business is not interstate?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it would apply unless such roads are engaged in interstate commerce; I have not made any such statement; but I doubt if the Senator would find a railroad in the United States—there may be a few—not engaged in interstate commerce. It would not, however, apply to purely intrastate property.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I can readily perceive that the Federal Government would have the right to condemn property which might be needed for the Federal Government's use, but it seems to me that the Federal Government would have no right, that it would be a usurpation and abuse of power for the Federal Government to condemn property merely for the purpose of getting title to it in order that it might sell it to somebody else. I can readily perceive that the Federal Government might condemn for its own use, and yet it would be an abuse of authority for it to use its power to authorize somebody else to condemn in order that a corporation might acquire the property of somebody else.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not agree with the Senator. I think the Government has that power. I may be an extreme Federalist, but, in my judgment, it has that power. The Senator, of course, has to reach his own conclusion. I realize there are some objections to this plan, and I am anxious to have everyone consider both sides of it. That it is necessary if we are going to have strong competitive lines of railroads that there should be some consolidation with the weaker lines, I am thoroughly convinced, and they will be more capable of competing for the business of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Utah that our power to regulate commerce among the States is a very broad one, as he undoubtedly recognizes. No one questions that under the power to regulate commerce among the States we can authorize the incorporation of a railway company. I assume that has been very well established. If we can authorize the incorporation of a railway company for the purpose of doing interstate business under our power to regulate commerce, it seems to me to follow almost inevitably that we can authorize that company to acquire the property which it must have in order that it may carry on interstate business. But I did not rise to discuss that particular question; I only want to say to the Senator from Utah that all the lawyers, so far as I know, who have appeared before our committee representing the railway companies, while somewhat disturbed with regard to the process of compulsory consolidation, agree—I do not remember a dissenting voice—that the Government of the United States can, in its exercise of the power to regulate commerce, condemn the property of a railway company already engaged in interstate commerce and chartered under the laws of a State. They all agree, so far as I can remember, that the power which the Government can exercise itself and for itself in that respect can be conferred upon a corporation organized under the laws of the United States. If I am not right in regard to that concurrence of opinion among the lawyers representing the railways, I hope I will be corrected by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, no lawyer who appeared before the committee or with whom I have talked has seriously questioned the constitutionality of a law which prescribes a system of consolidation of railroads, and it is my opinion that such a provision is constitutional. As I have said, some of them seriously object to it on various grounds; and it may perhaps shock the sensibilities of men to say that a road which is poorly constructed or badly operated and not earning a good income shall be taken and a consolidation enforced with a prosperous road that was wisely constructed and is well operated. It may be that such consolidation will tend too much to deaden the enterprise of the prosperous and efficient roads in the country. My own judgment is that we will never have to resort—I doubt if we should resort—to compulsory consolidation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is it not somewhat of a shock also to follow this bill to its logical sequence, which would result in the affirmation of the doctrine that no State shall hereafter—that is, after the passage of this bill—have the power to incorporate a company to engage in interstate commerce?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think so; I do not see any reason why the Congress should not provide for the incorporation of interstate railways. We must remember that at the present time probably 85 per cent of the business of the country is interstate commerce. We have ceased to be provincial in any part of the country. What John Marshall foretold nearly a hundred years ago has come true: The products of the remotest parts of the country are used in every other part; the great wheat-producing and cattle-producing valley of the Mississippi is necessary to the life of New England and of California; the fruits from the sunny land of the Pacific are used everywhere; coal is transported to all parts of the country; and the very life of the people is dependent upon transportation all over the United States. The time has passed when railroads can be governed or controlled by any local or domestic conditions, because the great transportation of the country is interstate. I do not wish to build up the power of the Federal Government and extend the supervision of meddlesome, stupid boards over all the business of this country; not at all; it should not be done. I am desirous of maintaining the State commissions and State authorities in their police regulations, because they are at the door of the people and they can reach them; but it is impossible, in all respects, to have the great transportation systems of the country controlled by 48 separate States; it can not be done. I do not wish, however, to have the railroads managed by great central bureaus from Washington. I have seen too much of that in the last two years.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me once again, I want Senators who are here to bear in mind that the objection just made by the Senator from Utah is not to the consolidation feature of this bill. If the objection is well taken—and we can consider that hereafter—it relates to an entirely different part of the bill, namely, the one which requires the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission before railroads are constructed. I do not want to get the consolidation section unduly mixed up with that proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Providing the constitutional objections are overcome, is it not true that the efficiency of the transportation systems will be greatly improved and the transportation systems more economically managed by consolidation than otherwise?

Mr. KELLOGG. To a certain extent I think that is true. Beyond a certain degree I think it would be inefficient. I think all the great principal lines of transportation should be managed in separate companies, as this bill proposes.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as objecting to Government regulation. For many years I have been in favor of regulation of the issuing of securities, and I think it would have prevented many a scandal in our financial history. I recommended it more than 10 years ago and urged it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I, of course, realize that rates must be regulated, and service must be regulated to some extent, but we must not go too far. This bill, I think, goes to the limit. It not only regulates the issuance of securities and rates, which, of course, must be regulated, but it practically fixes the wages of employees, regulates the securities which are to be issued, takes away the percentage of earnings above 6 per cent, and gives the power to route traffic; and, in my judgment, while many of these provisions are wise they go as far as I am willing to go in public regulation if the competitive system is to be maintained.

Mr. President, I do not expect that these consolidations will produce as uniform a system of earnings or uniform earning capacity as the Senator from Iowa does. I think they will very greatly aid in equalizing the earning capacity of roads, and together with the permissive pooling, which must be done under the Interstate Commerce Commission, will go far toward securing these poorer systems which need help. I do not expect, however, that lines like the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, reaching from Chicago to Milwaukee, St. Paul, Portland, and Seattle, a great transcontinental system which to-day is not earning the interest on its bonds, can consolidate so that it will have the same earnings as the Union Pacific, which is earning $17,000,000 surplus over its fixed charges. The Milwaukee should have fair and reasonable rates, its share of what will produce a fair return on all property in the district, and it must hustle for business, improve its service, add to its earnings in that way, and get what it can. The object of this bill is not to take from the Union Pacific and give to the Milwaukee, although that might go much further toward equalizing earnings, but it is to take the surplus over and above what the Congress believes to be a fair return which the Union Pacific should earn. While I am willing to admit that there are grave objections to that, that is the plan provided in the bill.

There is one advantage to be obtained by the system of Federal reincorporation and consolidation provided for in this bill. There is a prevailing idea throughout the country that the railroads to-day are enormously overcapitalized and that the public has been paying excessive rates to pay dividends on watered stock. This system of reincorporation and consolidation proposes that the capitalization shall be on the basis of valuation by the Interstate Commerce Commission which was provided for in the act of 1913, and that hereafter no stock shall be issued which does not represent money or property for the face value thereof, and that the issuance of bonds shall be under the control of the commission. When this is done it will settle once and for all that question, and there will be an ascertained value of the property on which to base the rates of income of all railroads in the United States, for, after all, the value of the property devoted to the public use must be the controlling factor in making rates. It is all right to say that a reasonable rate should be fixed without regard to the value of the property devoted to the public use, but that is not done and never will be done, and as Congress has no power to fix a rate which will deny to a carrier a reasonable income upon its property, that value should be, in fact must be, determined. The valuation by the commission will be completed in a couple of years more, and in the meantime the commission may use all the information at its disposal in fixing the fair value of the roads in each district. There is no doubt that some roads are very much overcapitalized and some ronds are very much undercapitalized. As a whole, from all the information I can gather from talking with members of the commission and from my own experience, the total value of the railroads in the United States thus found will not be less than the present capitalization, stock, and bonds.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as Appendix G, as a part of my remarks, two statements showing the book valuation and the capitalization—stock and bonds stated separately—of all railroads in the United States—classes 1, 2, and 3—together with a letter from the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission explaining the same.

These statements include the capitalization and book value of all the railroads, while most of the statistics of the commission are made up on the basis of class 1 railroads. I believe that the class 1 roads in 1917 yielded, however, from 95 to 97½ per cent of the operating revenue and covered 89.52 per cent of the operating mileage of all roads.

Furthermore, these statistics do not show the money borrowed by railroads and carried in short-term notes as unfunded indebtedness, so that the capitalization is really somewhat larger than these figures.

This capitalization is also made up by excluding all duplications of stocks and bonds; that is, where one company is holding the stocks and bonds of another the stocks and bonds so held are excluded. It is only the stock and bonds in the hands of the public that are here given. The total capitalization of all the railroads on December 31, 1917, was probably about $17,000,000,000 and the book value about $18,500,000,000.

Mr. KING. Is that classes 1, 2, and 3, or just class 1?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is all railroads.

Now, it is contended that the book value is not a fair basis. It is not, of course. In the case of some roads the book value far exceeds the value of the roads. In respect of other roads it does not. The capitalization probably would be a fairer estimate of the value of the property, because many of the roads which issued stock in the early days without any value have been foreclosed and reorganized.

The water has been squeezed out during the last 40 or 50 years, and additional capital has been invested. Some roads have never capitalized all they have put in. For instance, the Burlington has a book value of about $475,000,000, which I do not think is excessive. Its stock and bond issue is about $275,000,000. It has followed the policy of not capitalizing all of the money put in. Many other roads are in the same condition, so I should say that the capitalization is more accurate than the book value; but in all the statistics which I have furnished to the Senate I have used book value, because it is on that basis that the commission has made up many of these statistics.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is it not a fact also that through the process of these receiverships many of these roads have been bought in at very much less than their actual value?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes. Take the Chicago Great Western Railroad, which went through the hands of a receiver a few years ago. It was recapitalized when it went through the hands of a receiver for much less than it was before, but I think much more than it was worth, and since then its capital has been charged off until I was informed by the president the other day that it is now charged down below what the commission probably will find its actual value to be and certainly below what it could be built for to-day; but there are others, like the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, which have a book value of $100,000 a mile, which is absurd on its face. So, I say, this bill does not propose to take those values, or stock and bond values, for the basis of rate making. It proposes to take the value which the commission shall find from time to time in each rate-making district.

Now, I wish to say a word about the Government control of issuance of securities.

It is proposed in this bill, section 24, that the issuance of all railroad securities shall be under the control of the board of railway transportation. It is perfectly evident and conceded by the States that the issuance of railroad securities can not be left to the conflicting laws of various States. For instance, the Milwaukee road would have to obtain the consent, on terms fixed by the State, of a dozen States, in order to issue any general security upon its property. The same condition, to a greater or less extent, exists as to all interstate roads. It is, therefore, proposed to place this under one Government board.

While the railroads should be given sufficient latitude to place their securities on different rates of interest and income, there should be some governmental authority to prevent the abuse of this power as it has existed in the years past. I realize, of course, when the country was new and men were building railroads ahead of civilization, that securities could not be sold except on a speculative basis, with an opportunity to make more than an ordinary rate of interest. I saw the first mile of railroad built west of the Missouri River. That great country has been developed by men who were willing to risk the investment in constructing lines of transportation into the country before it was settled. Most of these roads have been through the hands of a receiver one, two, or three times, and the water which was originally in the stock has been squeezed out, and in some cases the value of the property now exceeds the capitalization, while in other cases, of course, the capitalization far exceeds the value of the property. I think, however, the time has come when the interests of the railroad and the investor require Government supervision of the issuance of these securities, in order that they may inure to the benefit of the investing public and will prevent some of the gross scandals which have occurred in railroad financing as well as in other financing. There is no danger at this time of any such financing, because you could not sell railroad securities at any price. But when prosperity returns to the roads, it is wise to have such regulation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that the stock-jobbing exploitation of the Rock Island could have occurred if this provision had been in force at that time?

Mr. KELLOGG. It could not; nor of the Alton, nor of some other roads with which I am familiar. I was employed by the Interstate Commerce Commission some years ago, if I may be pardoned for mentioning it, to investigate the Alton when its capitalization was raised in a short time from about $24,000,000 to over $100,000,000—my recollection is to about $120,000,000—without adding more than $20,000,000 to the real value of the property, to the real investment. That could not occur under this provision

I may be mistaken in this, but my recollection is—and the chairman will correct me if I am wrong—that all of the State commissions approved this plan.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator is right about that. It is one of the few phases of the matter upon which there is practical unanimity among State commissions, so far as the enlargement of the Federal power is concerned. They are rather slow to concede that enlargement, but, as I recall it, the national association of State commissions and State utilities bodies has more than once passed a resolution providing for some such plan as is provided in the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I might add that, in addition to that, the United States Chamber of Commerce took a referendum vote upon this question, and it was carried by a large majority, with very few votes in opposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. Undoubtedly there is necessity for such legislation, and, as I said before, some years ago I urged it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission after the investigation of the Alton, and my recollection is the commission recommended to Congress a uniform system. The House passed the bill, and I think the Senate committee approved the bill. But I am not sure about that; I was not in the Senate at that time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is right.

Mr. KELLOGG. One of the most important features of this bill is the provision for creating regional boards for adjusting the disputes between the railroads and their employees and the prevention of conspiracies for the purpose of hindering and delaying interstate transportation. These are sections 25 to 31, inclusive. It is unnecessary for me to discuss the details of the plans for the adjustment of wage disputes. Such provision is absolutely necessary, and the only question is the formation of such a tribunal. I understand this movement meets generally the approval of the employees, so far as the general construction of the boards is concerned, though I believe there are some changes recommended so that all employees, including unorganized employees, may be represented.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I have wondered, in reading the bill, whether the committee, in the consideration of this branch of the bill, took into account the proposition that the public perhaps should be represented upon these boards. As I recall the provision now being discussed by the Senator, there are four members to be selected from the employees and four from the representatives of the corporations.

In view of the fact that there is so much governmental supervision here, and the theory of the bill revolves around the central proposition that the interests of the public are paramount, did it not occur to the committee that perhaps the interests of the Government would best be subserved if the personnel of this board should be changed somewhat and the public be represented?

Mr. KELLOGG. It did occur to the committee and was discussed at considerable length. The committee provided for representation on the part of the public on the transportation board. In other words, no finding of these boards affecting wages and working conditions can be put into force without the approval of the transportation board. It was thought that the public interests would be protected by that supervision. Of course, it is important that the railroads on the one hand and the employees on the other should not fix absolutely the burdens which are to be placed on the public in the nature of transportation charges.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the right inure to the board except in cases where there is a division of opinion in the committee on wages and working conditions? Is the approval of the board still requisite?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is still requisite before they are put into force.

I understand this movement meets the approval generally of the employers and employees. But the feature which is to-day the strong center of discussion is that which prevents conspiracies and tie-ups of railroads by what are commonly known as strikes.

Under our industrial and civic organizations, with large cities and manufacturing centers as consumers, and wide expanse of agricultural country producing necessaries of life, the daily operation of the transportation systems of the country is not only necessary to prosperity but it is necessary to the lives of the people of this country. If they were to be stopped for any considerable length of time, for any cause, our system of industrial organization and civic centers must be abandoned and the people resort to the primitive mode of life, where each man produces the necessaries sufficient for his existence.

I believe, of course, in the principles of personal liberty contained in the Bill of Rights above all other guaranties conceived by the minds of men. I believe those principles guaranteeing individual liberty, the right to labor and to enjoy its fruits, the right to home and property, to religious beliefs, and freedom of speech and action, to be the great principles on which our very Government and civilization depend, for which our race struggled for more than 600 years. I would not imperil those rights for any material advantages, but, under the modern system of transportation and communication, where the necessaries produced in one part of the country support life in another, where men in all parts of the country and the world may communicate with each other and act under common impulses and by common agreement, the Government in the past has been compelled to step in and prevent monopoly and restraint of trade by combinations, in order to protect the people in their individual rights. And I do not know of any reason why any class of people should not be prohibited from conspiring or confederating to paralyze the transportation of the country, to stop the wheels of industry of the country, and to overthrow our Government, because, if any class of men may do one of these things, we may find them in the halls of Congress, as we have done, demanding the enactment of laws under threat of starvation of the public.

I am not unsympathetic with the rights of labor. As the chairman of the committee said, I know what it means to labor. I earned my own living from the time I was 13 years of age. I firmly believe that labor should be well paid, prosperous, and happy, and families well educated, so that they will become good citizens, because upon their prosperity, their stability, their intelligence, rests the hope of the Nation.

The farmer's boy, the laborer's son, must have before him the hope of the highest places in industry and in civic life. These are the mainsprings which make a great progressive civilization. I am opposed to taking from them the right and the hope that every man may benefit by his own ingenuity, his enterprise, his brains, and his capacity. I would not allow anyone to level or attempt to level all human endeavor. The exploded theory of the socialists undertakes to do that. While I believe in collective bargaining and the protection of labor, the time has come in this country when we have to determine whether this Government is by all the people or by any class of people. It is in the interest of labor. It is in the interest of the great masses that they should have the opportunity to reach higher and better positions. That hope should always be held out to them by the Government by protecting them in their rights.

I am anxious to welcome the time when antagonisms between labor and capital disappear, so that the American people may enjoy happiness and prosperity, free from the menace of domestic disaster, induced by industrial differences of far-reaching effect.

NOTE.—"Net operating income" is the balance of operating revenues after payment of operating expenses, taxes chargeable to railway operation, equipment, and joint facility rentals, and is taken from the monthly returns of the roads to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The entries under "fixed charges" are based upon returns for the year 1918. They comprise interest on funded and unfunded debt, rents for lease of road, corporate and special war taxes not chargeable to railway operation, expenses of maintaining corporate organizations, and other income charges for the current year. Neither dividends nor lap-over accounts with the Railroad Administration relating to earlier years are included. Actual fixed charges for 1919 will be somewhat greater than indicated by these figures, and the relative ability of the railway companies to meet these charges somewhat less. "Balance over fixed charges" represents the amount available for dividends, for appropriations, and for surplus.

APPENDIX G.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, November 7, 1919.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KELLOGG: The inclosed statements show the net railway capital segregated as to stocks and bonds and the property investment of steam roads of Classes I, II, and III from 1910 to 1918. Switching companies are not included. The segregation between stocks and bonds as to net capital was not made prior to 1910.

The net capital can not be given for Class I roads and their subsidiaries separately. The property investment of such companies on December 31, 1917, was as follows:

Class I operating companies	$14,822,227,582
Nonoperating companies subsidiary to Class I	2,939,924,545

Although the corresponding figure has not been published in statistical reports prior to 1917, a close approximation can be made on a percentage basis as follows:

Property investment of Class I roads and their nonoperating subsidiaries.

Dec. 31—
1917	17,762,152,127
1916	16,884,440,038
June 30—

1911	14,246,167,475

As to the proportion of the roads under Federal control, it may be of assistance to note that out of a total of $932,607,366 net railway operating income for the test period approximately $916,441,811, or 98.3 per cent, represents all steam roads under Federal control of Classes I, II, and III and switching and terminal companies.

Respectfully, GEORGE B. MCGINTY, Secretary.

APPENDIX I.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 25, 1919.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KELLOGG: As requested in your letter of August 21, I have checked the statement which you inclosed, and am sending a new copy herewith. I have added the Pennsylvania Railroad and a few other companies and have also shown the dividend rate. I have omitted the Bessemer & Lake Erie from the statement, as the financial organization is such that the dividend rate is misleading. It has a capital stock of only $500,000.

The statement makes practically the same showing as the original which you submitted. The changes are chiefly due to the fact that I have shown the returns of the operating companies as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission, whereas the statement you inclosed used system figures in some cases.

The dividends shown are the total declared during the year, regardless of whether shown in the income account or the profit and loss account.

It may be noted that in the year 1918 the income account of many of the railroad corporations contains a large deduction which will not obtain in 1919, namely, the net debit on account of revenues and expenses for 1917 carried over into 1918. In a few cases there is a net credit, and some of the roads put these items through the profit and loss account and not through the income account. The amount of this item (net) is shown on a separate sheet attached to the table. On the other hand, other items of fixed charges may be increased in 1919.

Yours, very truly,

M. O. LORENZ, Statistician.

PROPOSED WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I would not do anything to delay or hinder the consideration and passage of the railroad bill. I understand, however, that there is no one who desires to discuss it this afternoon, and that but very little further consideration will be given to it to-day. So I am very much in the position of the gentleman who attended a meeting, and finding no one desirous of discussing the subject for which the meeting was called, decided that he would submit some remarks on another subject.

There is a bill on the calendar, Mr. President, that deals with a subject of scarcely less importance than this railroad legislation, which I hope to have the Senate consider as soon as the pending bill is disposed of. So I am going to discuss that measure for just a little while this afternoon in the hope that by taking the time that is not going to be used now I can save a little time when that bill comes up for consideration and get earlier action upon it.

I refer to water-power legislation. The House has already passed a bill dealing with that very important question. It has been the subject of discussion for many years, and we hope that at this session Congress will take action upon it. It may not be necessary, Mr. President, to point out the importance of water-power development, but its great need will justify me in doing so at this time.

Conflict is the zest of life between nations, whether it be on the battle field in time of war or fighting for world trade in time of peace. Plentiful cheap energy derived from hydroelectric power used for manufacture of explosives, munitions, and supplies and to release man power for the Army and Navy in war time and to turn the factory wheels to enable success in competition with other nations for the markets of the world in times of peace is one of the greatest aids to success that a nation can have.

If 10 years ago, instead of enacting restrictive laws which have prohibited development of our water powers, Congress had invited their development through fair and reasonable terms, the beginning of the World War would have found the United States with 20,000,000 developed hydroelectric power instead of 5,000,000. Indeed, it is not too much to say that Germany would have hesitated before entering the conflict with probability of having to face a Nation possessing such an enormous amount of harnessed physical force wherewith to back up its armies. As it was, the beginning of the Great War found us short of coal, short of oil, short of power, and half a billion dollars was expended inside of two years in the erection of steam-power plants, many of which, built haphazard under war-time stress, are now useless owing to unfavorable location. Through failure of Congress to pass water-power laws under which money could be safely invested with prospect of a fair return, water powers now wasting have been held back from development in at least 22 States of the Union, as follows:

Actual water-power developments which are projected to be undertaken upon navigable streams upon enactment of a rational Federal water-power act.

State.	River.	Horsepower to be developed.	Miles of inland waterway improved.
Washington	Columbia	410,000	160
Do	Pend Oreille	250,000	80
Montana	Missouri	100,000	110
Minnesota	St. Croix	30,000	26
Iowa	Des Moines	60,000	201
Maryland	Susquehanna	110,000	15
Massachusetts-Connecticut	Connecticut	30,000	23
Georgia	Chattahoochee	138,000	138
Alabama	Tennessee	410,000	35
Tennessee	Clinch	25,000	14
Alabama	Coosa	180,000	76
Kentucky	Cumberland	26,000	71
Georgia	Flint	30,000	12
North Carolina	Little Tennessee	200,000	84
Virginia	New	20,000	10
Do	Roanoke	35,000	20
South Carolina-Georgia	Savannah	78,000	85
		2,122,000	1,160

It is estimated that in addition to the above the development of over 2,000,000 horsepower would be undertaken upon non-navigable streams in the States of California, Idaho, Oregon, Nevada, Montana, Utah, Colorado, and Arkansas.

The report of the Geological Survey shows that our consumption of coal for all purposes during the year 1913 was about 570,000,000 short tons, of which the railroads alone used about 20 per cent. This tremendous tonnage requires for mining and transportation the labor of 1,500,000 men and the use of over 1,000,000 freight cars and 40,000 locomotives. In addition to this the petroleum used in 1913 was equivalent to 24,000,000 tons of coal. Every water horsepower now going to waste which could be economically substituted for fuel power would represent approximately 5½ tons of coal per year, based on an average of 12 hours per day. The labor of one man is released for other uses every time 50 hydroelectric horsepower is developed, and every 150 water horsepower developed releases one freight car for other duty. To indicate what are the possibilities of conservation along this line we need merely to reflect upon the fact that the ultimate development of the 61,678,000 horsepower contained in the rivers and streams of the United States on the foregoing coal consumption basis of a 24-hour day is equivalent to the annual use of nearly 780,000,000 tons of coal—being a little more than the total amount of coal used in the United States—which at $2 per ton represents an annual value of $1,560,000,000. Of course this represents the maximum attainable development, which will not be approached for a long period, but it also represents the end which may finally be achieved.

The largest amount of water power in any one State is contained in my State of Washington, which has nearly 10,000,000 water horsepower, of which less than 3 per cent has been developed. There coal is mined and steam-power plants are operated within the sound of descending waters, and trainloads of coal are imported each day from British Columbia.

Through a silent, barren, desert country in the center of our State, where the rainfall is less than 5 inches per year, where the population does not average one person to the square mile, and where hundreds of thousands of acres of the best soil in the world lie parched and unproductive for lack of water, flows the mighty Columbia, twelfth largest river of the world. For 70 miles it washes desolate, arid shores, which if the water could be lifted from the river to the land would teem with agricultural life and population. And in the river in the midst of this desolation lies latent the means which, if utilized, would lift the water to the thirsty land in the great Priest Rapids water power, now wasting but capable of producing 250,000 primary—all the year round—horsepower, available for great industries which will be established as soon as the electrical energy is available for use. And, providentially, as the irrigation season begins in March, the melting snows and glaciers of the mountains on the northern Columbia cause the river to rise to double its winter volume, and from March to October make another 250,000 horsepower, together with abundance of water available for agricultural purposes. I give you this object lesson, because it is one that has come under my personal observation; but it is only one of many projects in many different States which have been held back from development for years solely because Congress has not enacted the legislation which would make it possible. Every undeveloped water power for which a market now exists represents a waste of an inexhaustible natural resource.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator going to speak of any other river?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I am not going to refer to any other.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice in the table another river is mentioned——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Pend Oreille River.

Mr. NORRIS. In the Pend Oreille River there seem to be more water-power possibilities than in the Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not that true?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. I judged that from the table as I hurriedly glanced at it. I may be mistaken.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is mistaken. The Columbia has 410,000 horsepower and the Pend Oreille 250,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The utilization of even one-third of the enormous amount of energy latent but now wasting in our falling waters would make the United States the greatest manufacturing country of the world. The development of our water powers is intimately connected with the solution of such great national problems as the national defense; extension of inland waterways; shortage of food; conservation of coal, oil, and labor; irrigation of arid lands; and railroad car shortage. In addition to conserving vast quantities of coal and labor to mine and handle it, the hydroelectric energy existing in our running waters will, when developed, be utilized in the manufacture of explosives, fertilizers, wood pulp and paper, electro-chemicals, copper and aluminum, and in other industrial applications.

I might say here that probably every Member of the Senate has had brought to his attention the very serious condition confronting the print-paper industry of the country. Newspaper plants are threatened with being closed on account of lack of paper supply. I desire to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks at this point a letter from Samuel P. Weston, formerly manager of a great newspaper in my State, with reference to this particular situation and the particular importance of the development of water power in connection with wood-pulp and print-paper manufacture. I ask permission to print that in the RECORD without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, November 26, 1919.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been delayed in writing you the letter with regard to the bearing the water-power legislation will have on the newsprint supply of this country, owing to having been called to Toronto on my return from Washington, where I was detained several days.

I will try to give you the information briefly and in a general way. First, it should be kept in mind that power is one of the main essentials in the manufacture of mechanical pulp. Next, the power should be situated as closely as possible to the pulp-wood stands.

The paper-making industry of the United States was centralized in the northern tier of States, more particularly in New York State, where there were large stands of spruce and pulp-wood timbers. During the past 25 years these pulp-wood stands have been in a large measure exhausted. Up to 1910 practically all the newsprint used in the United States was produced in this country. In 1918 the production of newsprint in the United States was less than in 1910. In other words, while the consumption was steadily increased, the production of American mills was decreased.

In the same period, between 1910 and 1918, the sales of Canadian mills of newsprint to the United States increased 2,600 per cent, Canadian production having gone from 161,000 tons in 1910 to 738,000 tons in 1918.

Up to 1910 Canada permitted the export of pulp cut from Crown lands. In 1910 the export of pulp-wood timbers from Crown lands was prohibited. Immediately following this came a rapid transfer of newsprint manufacture to Canada, with the result that practically all of the new paper-mill developments during the past 10 years have been made in Canada.

While the consumption of newsprint in the United States is, in round figures, 2,000,000 tons per year, of which the American mills manufacture 1,250,000 tons, these figures do not convey the real situation with regard to the industry, as in order to manufacture this amount of tonnage the American mills import from Canada 750,000 tons of ground wood pulp and sulphite, securing only 500,000 tons of their raw materials from the American pulp-wood stands.

The paper mills located in New York State produce practically one-half of the total tonnage of American mills, yet it is estimated by the Forest Service Department that the remaining pulp-wood stands in New York would not supply these mills beyond 10 years. The same estimates indicate that the pulp-wood stands of New York and the New England States will be exhausted within 20 years.

According to the general estimates of the Forest Service Department, there are pulp-wood timber stands in that portion of the country lying west of the Rocky Mountains and in Alaska to the extent of 244,000,000,000 feet board measure, over one-half of which is in the forest reserve. The estimate for the Tongas district of southeastern Alaska is 70,000,000,000 feet.

In order to make this vast resource available for paper making requires the passage of the water-power legislation, so that the necessary water-power developments may be financed.

It is not necessary to point out to you that the water powers lying in that section of the country west of the Rocky Mountains and in Alaska are practically all in the public domain, and the possibility of their development is dependent, in the first instance, on the passage of adequate water-power legislation.

Herewith is a table showing the estimated pulp-wood stands in the Western States, together with the estimated water-power possibility:

	Pulp-wood timber.	Water power.
	Feet b. m.	Horsepower.
Oregon	15,750,000,000	7,505,000
Washington	70,000,000,000	9,990,000
Idaho	12,950,000,000	2,919,000
Montana	15,750,000,000	4,809,000
California	32,[illegible]17,000,000	8,865,000
Colorado	13,880,000,000	1,950,000
Southeastern Alaska	70,000,000,000	.....

As you are aware, the American Newspaper Association has for the past two years been very actively urging the passage of water-power legislation, and the members of this association, which includes the leading daily newspapers of the country, have hoped for early action on the measure, as it is believed that its passage will be of beneficial interest to the Nation at large and will make available for early utilization the vast pulp-wood-timber resources in the West and the production of news print and paper products will be increased in this country.

At the present moment the news-print paper situation in the United States is the most acute in the history of the country, jeopardizing the entire publishing business in all parts of the country and threatening to force the suspension of many papers, both large and small. It is stated by the paper manufacturers that the present demand for news print is more than 10 per cent in excess of the production capacity of the mills in United States and Canada. The prices, which were $40 a ton in 1914, now run from a minimum of $90 a ton to $150 a ton. In many instances publishers have been unable to secure contracts for their 1920 requirements. Publishers who have heretofore been able to contract on terms of one, two, and three years are now limited to contracts on three-months basis and for a reduced tonnage.

I am quite certain that it will appeal to you that under our form of government it is a serious matter to have the newspapers of this country, from the smallest country weekly to the largest metropolitan daily, put in jeopardy when we have within the borders of the United States unused resources the utilization of which to any large extent is denied on account of the inadequate laws with relation to the water-power development in the public domain. The place of the press in the political and economic operation of our Government is such that any disaster which threatens the well-being of the publishing business is a matter of direct and vital interest to every citizen of the United States.

I have not attempted to give you more than a general survey of the situation. If there is any other point that you desire more fully covered, I will be very glad to cover the same to the best of my ability. I would also point out to you that the newspapers of the country themselves are endeavoring to meet the present emergency by every possible economy in the use of paper. They are limiting the size of the editions, cutting down the amount of advertising space published, increasing the rates both for subscription and advertising. It seems to be the opinion, however, of the leading publishers that the only relief that can be expected will be the utilization of the western pulp-wood timber where the same is available. To that end certain large paper-mill undertakings to be located on the Pacific coast have been under consideration for the past two years, their establishment, however, being dependent on the passage of the water-power legislation under which the necessary water-power developments may be financed.

Yours, very truly,

S. P. WESTON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, under new electrical processes our deposits of phosphates, clays, and minerals would be used to an enormous extent. The power would also be used for electrification of thousands of miles of railroads. Pumping plants driven by this cheap hydroelectric power would furnish water to reclaim fully 10,000,000 acres of now desert lands in locations where the power is now wasting and the lands useless, though their shores are washed by great rivers, and this at a time when increase of crops is so much needed to bring down cost of living and to furnish homes and employment to thousands of agriculturists. Over 4,000 miles of the upper reaches of our streams would be opened to navigation. The cost of these river improvements would be upward of $800,000,000, and if accomplished by private capital for purpose of power production instead of through taxation would not cost the Government a dollar except for the bare locks and removal of minor obstacles in those portions of the streams not connected with power development.

If these river improvements were in one stream, it would be equivalent to creating a navigable waterway across the continent from New York to San Francisco. But in reality it means the extension of navigation for an aggregate of 4,000 miles in 25 rivers, traversing 20 States, in such widely different sections of the country as Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Florida, Arkansas, Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Washington, and Idaho. In this way cheap water transportation would be afforded to districts but now sparsely settled and congestion of traffic relieved in thickly populated centers through the investment of private capital instead of through river and harbor appropriations by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator the names of those rivers and the approximate mileage that would be opened in each?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not of the particular rivers. I am just submitting really a summary of my investigations.

Mr. WARREN. It is very interesting, and I thought perhaps the Senator has such a list.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not a detailed statement, but I will say to the Senator that the matter I am presenting is based upon a careful investigation of the different streams and different possibilities.

In view of the great economical success of the electrification of 1,000 miles of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, it is almost certain that in the near future a majority of the railroads operating through the mountainous country of the far West, where hydroelectric power can be developed cheaply, will adopt electricity as motive power. Forty-eight thousand seven hundred miles of railroad are now being operated in the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada. It is estimated that 10,000 horsepower is needed to operate 100 miles of single track, and therefore it will require 4,870,000 horsepower to electrify all of the railroads in these States, or one-ninth of the total hydroelectric power possible to develop in the territory traversed by these railroads.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to inquire whether he has pursued his studies so as to enable him to answer a question as to how far we can transmit electric power, the distance of transmission, and the losses occurring by reason of transmission?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is uncertain how far electric power can be transmitted, but it has been shown that it can be economically transmitted at least 200 or 250 miles.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is my recollection of it. It is my recollection that the power generated at Hales Bar, about 15 miles below Chattanooga on the Tennessee River, is transmitted to Nashville, about 150 miles away, and is there used to operate the street cars.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think power has been transmitted as far as 400 miles, but I do not think it has been demonstrated conclusively that that is economically wise. The possibilities in that direction are really unknown as yet.

A great portion of the trackage is over mountain divisions, and the use of electricity in place of coal will result in great economy of operation, obviate the danger of forest fires, and by elimination of noise, smoke, gas, and dust, and through a more generous ventilation, which will be possible when the flying cinder need no longer be taken into account, will make travel far more safe, comfortable, and pleasant than at present, and it will go far toward curing the freight-transportation problem through relieving car shortage, as the cars now used for carrying coal for railroad use can be used to carry freight.

Great electrochemical manufacturing plants will be built in many different parts of the country, coincident with the development of hydroelectric energy, for the manufacture of such chemicals as calcium carbide, caustic soda, bleaching powder, abrasives, and electrodes; in electrolytic treatment of metals and alloys such as copper, zinc, aluminum, silicon, and vanadium; and in production of acetone and atmospheric nitric acid, used in making powder and explosives.

Other countries are awake to the necessity of developing their water powers. A French corporation with $250,000,000 of capital is about to undertake the utilization of 700,000 horsepower now wasting in the River Rhone, and incidentally these improvements will, through canalization, make it possible for boats to go up the Rhone to its connection with the River Rhine and thence down the Rhine. Italy, which is entirely without coal, is about to develop her water powers on an immense scale. Spain is offering liberal concessions looking to the development of her water powers now wasting in the Pyrenees and other mountain ranges. Great hydroelectric projects are about to be undertaken in the Scandinavian countries and in South America. American bankers are being pressed by advantageous offers to finance many of these foreign water-power developments. American engineers are being employed to construct them, and American manufacturers of water wheels and power machinery are booking orders for their capacity for foreign shipment. If Congress delays enactment of a workable water-power law the development of the water powers of this country may have to await completion of foreign hydroelectric projects before they can be begun, because the necessary money, skilled men, and machinery will have gone abroad and not be available here. Already American concerns because of lack of available water power in the United States, caused by its being impossible to develop them under present Federal laws, have been forced to establish electrochemical plants in Canada, Norway, and France. These expatriated plants, costing millions of dollars and employing thousands of men, have developed over 250,000 horsepower in foreign countries which should have been located in the United States.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to insert in the RECORD two or three letters which I have received with reference to this matter. One is from the William Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Building Co., pointing out conditions that have been brought to their attention. One statement of the letter I wish to read, as follows:

> You may be interested to know that at the present time this company is receiving about three foreign inquiries for water-power machinery to every one received from within the United States. Some of the countries from which such inquiries are coming are Canada, Spain, France, and Great Britain. If orders should be placed for manufacture in this country in a volume corresponding to the inquiries now being received we may see our shops filled with foreign orders instead of for machinery for use in this country.

Another letter is from the S. Morgan Smith Co., manufacturers of water wheels, power-transmitting machinery, and so forth. Another is from the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. (Inc.), the letter being written by the "assistant to chairman." I shall not take the time to read anything from the other letters, but I hope that Senators will read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters referred to by the Senator from Washington will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

THE WILLIAM CRAMP & SONS SHIP & ENGINE BUILDING CO.,
Philadelphia, October 9, 1919.

Subject: Bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission, etc.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: On behalf of the William Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Building Co., I desire to urge most strongly the passage of the above bill at the earliest possible date.

This company, as one of the largest, and probably the largest, manufacturer of water-power machinery in this country, is in close touch with the situation existing in the field of water-power development, both in this country and abroad. It would seem to us to require no argument that one of the most important elements during the present reconstruction period in this country is the immediate development of our natural resources, and of these none is more important than the development of our enormous potential water powers.

The utilization of our water-power resources has in the last few years come to a standstill, and at present there are practically no developments of major importance being carried out in this country. The shops of this company which are normally intended for the manufacture of the machinery required in water-power plants are almost completely idle, and we have been obliged to lay off a large part of our force in this department on account of the lack of orders; and we know that the same condition exists with all of the manufacturers in this country. This condition corresponds to a similar situation in the construction of the dams, canals, power houses, and other large works required in carrying out water-power projects. In the whole of this field idleness exists, and this is the condition at the very time when the country is faced with a serious fuel shortage and with extremely high costs of power throughout the industrial field. The chief cause in maintaining this situation is the delay of Congress in taking any measures which would relieve the water-power field from the artificial and obsolete legislative restrictions now existing.

The passage of the bill now before the Senate would effectually relieve the situation and its early adoption will be most earnestly advocated by all those who are conversant with the industrial situation.

A very practical and far from negligible means of offsetting the ever-increasing trend of prices is the reduction in the cost of power to our industries, which can be effected by the adequate use of our water-power resources. Until Congress enacts the necessary legislation, however, water-power projects will remain at a standstill awaiting the decision of Congress on this point. In contrast to the situation in this country, many foreign countries have adopted a governmental policy of active promotion of water-power projects. Instead of permitting restrictive legislation to prohibit such development, in a number of foreign countries aid and encouragement is given in order to promote such development. You may be interested to know that at the present time this company is receiving about three foreign inquiries for water-power machinery to every one received from within the United States. Some of the countries from which such inquiries are coming are Canada, Spain, France, and Great Britain. If orders should be placed for manufacture in this country in a volume corresponding to the inquiries now being received we may see our shops filled with foreign orders instead of for machinery for use in this country.

Assuring you of our earnest support in anything you may do to forward the development of water power in the United States, we are,

Yours, very truly,

THE WILLIAM CRAMP & SONS SHIP & ENGINE BUILDING CO.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand that the water-power bill which has been in Congress for several years will shortly come up again for consideration. As you have had to do with the framing of this bill, we thought it might be interesting to you to receive from us an expression on the subject as we see it at the present time.

We are one of the largest manufacturers of turbine water wheels in the country. We have a large plant equipped with machinery especially adapted to the building of turbine water wheels, and have worked, at times, as many as 900 men.

Ever since the passage of the bill restricting the development of water powers, about eight or nine years ago, the industry has suffered very much, until at the present time we are working less than 250 men in the manufacturing of water wheels, with no prospects of any improvement; in fact, there has been no new water-power development work east of the Rocky Mountains in the last five years worth speaking of, nor is there any going on at the present time. Some of the existing companies are making repairs and moderate extensions to their present developments, but the situation is such that it is impossible to get money into new development work, and we believe there will be no change until a favorable water-power bill is put through Congress, the delaying of which, in our opinion, may prove disastrous if not speedily acted on.

The manufacturers of water wheels can not hold their plants open indefinitely for water-wheel trade, and from the best information we believe that the major part of them, same as ourselves, are "casting around" for other lines of business, and if taken up, the hydroelectric people may find it impossible to secure equipment in the event they should suddenly require it.

Yours, very truly,

C. ELMER SMITH, President.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Understanding that you are interested in the proposed water-power legislation in the United States Senate, permit me to affirm my great disappointment in the continued postponement of said legislation, because, in my judgment, it is a matter of vital importance to our national prestige.

Both in my capacity as a private citizen of the United States, interested in the wise development of its natural resources in the public interest, and as an officer of Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., a manufacturer of hydroelectric machinery, I have given much thought to water power for a number of years.

During the war I demonstrated the national need in this particular, and a considerable correspondence held with the Fuel Administration; Judge Parker, the then priorities commissioner; and the electrical and power-equipment section of the War Industries Board led to the appointment of a water-power expert to investigate the possible development of such power to meet a serious emergency.

I have been instrumental in interesting assemblies of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which led to the issuance of a referendum, educing the biggest vote ever cast by the organization membership up to that time—a vote that exhibited a remarkable unanimity of business opinion throughout the United States on the urgent need of legislation in expediting our water-power development.

I have participated in many discussions of our water-power situation before war conventions of business and other large conferences of national organizations which have furnished opportunities to test the general sentiment in this regard. This, I believe, makes me competent to assert a strong conviction that we are actually losing ground by allowing foreign nations to surpass us in the development of their water powers and eventually give them the advantage they seek in our competition for world trade. This is already appreciated, as the following proves:

In 1917 an expert commission reported to Parliament that the United States are markedly superior industrially because their workmen have behind them over 50 per cent more power than British workmen, and a strong plea was presented for a rapid development of more "motive" power with a minimum consumption of fuel. As water power alone fully meets this specification, without a doubt the present active interest in the British development of its water power finds its inception in this report.

A similar activity in foreign lands everywhere, stimulated greatly by a critical fuel situation, is evidenced by an increase in foreign orders with our hydroelectric machinery manufacturers. I am informed that some water-power machinery manufacturers have actually more foreign than domestic orders now on their books, and Allis-Chalmers for one is receiving to-day five times more foreign than domestic inquiries for such machinery. This is suggestive, and I leave it to your good judgment what situation may arise if our manufacturing capacity in water-power machinery be crowded by the greater enterprise of foreign nations at a time when our own needs become insistent. Although our present producing capacity in such machinery far exceeds any probable domestic demand, as such foreign demand can easily be ten times any possible home requirement the possibilities in this regard deserve our best consideration. Furthermore, the special engineering and high mechanical skill required in this production prevents a quick expansion of such facilities, even if present manufacturers, who have suffered loss for many years from a stagnation in water-power development resulting from the uncertainty present laws induce, should care to undertake such expansion.

I may repeat much that you already know and only crave your indulgence on the ground that reiteration often emphasizes the need.

With great respect I beg to remain,

Faithfully, yours,

W. W. NICHOLS,
Assistant to Chairman.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why not give those who would develop our wasting water powers the right to work, the right to build and expand and develop, the right to help create a greater and more powerful industrial Nation? Why not give them a law to work under which shall encourage and not hamper their just activities—a law which, while placing them under the constant supervision of the public authorities, and sufficiently safeguarding every public interest, yet shall be of such a fair and business-like nature that under its operation men may hope for a generous return for their work and risk, and capital be assured of a safe investment? This done, they will open up deserts and make farms; they will build factories and cities, open up new reaches of inland waterways, employ labor, and reduce the cost of living.

The necessity for the development of our water power is of paramount importance to the people of the United States, and Congress should enact a law without further delay the terms of which will make the investment of capital safe and not prevent a reasonable return.

The bill now before the Senate is perhaps too restrictive in the terms and requirements it imposes on the capital invested and upon the details of operation, but water-power men tell me they can work under it, and I trust that the Senate may pass the committee bill without in any way making its terms more onerous.

Mr. President, I now desire to refer to the terms of the bill and to give a short synopsis of it for the RECORD.

The bill creates a Federal water-power commission consisting of the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture, to which is given authority over all matters over which the Federal Government has jurisdiction, pertaining to the development of water powers in navigable streams and the improvement of navigation incident thereto, over the development of water powers in the public domain, and the development of water powers in the national forests. Under the laws now in force the development of water powers contained in navigable streams is under the jurisdiction of the War Department, those in the public domain are under the Interior Department, and those in the national forests are under the Department of Agriculture. The establishment of this commission, according to those who strongly favor it, would promote unity of action, together with economy of operation, through segregating all authority in this board, whose members would bring to its aid the personnel and vast machinery of the three great governmental departments over which they preside. Personally, I doubt very much the wisdom of the establishment of this commission composed of Cabinet officers, but I am sure it is the best we can get and so I am willing to accept it in order to get legislation.

Under the bill the commission is granted authority to collect data concerning the utilization of the water-power resources of the Nation; to issue licenses for water-power development to citizens of the United States, to corporations organized under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, or to any State or municipality for a period not exceeding 50 years; to issue preliminary permits for a period of not exceeding three years to enable applicants for licenses to secure necessary data, and to hold hearings and take testimony regarding applications for preliminary permits or licenses. The commission is required to submit yearly reports to Congress setting forth the permits and licenses issued under the act and the moneys received, if any, on account thereof.

Before issuing preliminary permits or licenses which have not been preceded by a preliminary permit to persons or corporations, the commission must give notice of such applications to any State or municipality likely to be affected or interested, and must also publish notice of such applications for eight weeks in a daily or weekly newspaper published in the county or counties in which the project is situated. The commission is obliged to give preference to applications from States and municipalities for preliminary permits or for licenses where no preliminary permit has been issued, provided the plans for the same are equally well adapted to utilize the water resources of the region.

Should, in their judgment, the development of any project be undertaken by the United States itself, the commission shall not approve any application for such project, but shall cause to be made such plans and estimates of cost as it may deem necessary and submit its recommendations to Congress.

The provisions of the act do not revoke any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, but any person, corporation, State, or municipality holding such permit or right of way may apply for a license under the act.

No transfer of any license other than in connection with a mortgage or trust deed or under tax sale can be made without the written consent of the commission.

The commission is empowered to establish a system of accounts to be maintained by licensees, and to require them to make, upon oath, such reports and statements as it shall request.

Each applicant for a license is required to submit to the commission—

(a) Such maps, plans, and estimates as may be required for a full understanding of the project, to be made a part of the license, and not to be changed without the approval of the commission.

(b) Satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the State laws within which the proposed project is to be located with respect to the use of water and the right to engage in the business of developing, transmitting, and distributing power.

(c) Such other information as the commission may require.

All licensees are required to maintain their project works in a condition of adequate repair and to make all necessary renewals and replacements for their efficient operation and to establish and maintain adequate depreciation reserves for such purposes.

Each licensee is liable for all damages occasioned to the property of others through the construction or operation of his project works, and in no event is the United States to become liable therefor.

After the first 20 years of operation the licensee is required to maintain amortization reserves out of any surplus earned in excess of a reasonable return on the investment.

No charge is to be made for licenses issued to States or municipalities, for State or municipal purposes, or for projects of not to exceed 200 horsepower capacity, but all other licensees are to pay such reasonable annual charges as may be fixed by the commission, for reimbursing the United States for cost of administration of the act and for use of Government lands, but the charges are not in any event to exceed 25 cents per developed horsepower. These charges are to be paid into the United States Treasury to be used as Congress may direct toward paying cost of the administration of the act, the remainder to be expended under direction of the commission in maintenance of dams or other navigation structures owned by the United States or in the construction and operation of headwater improvements of streams upon which the commission is authorized to issue licenses.

Licensees are to pay their proportionate share for benefits received from storage reservoirs or other headwater improvements constructed by the United States or by other licensees.

If the dam or project works are to be constructed in any of the navigable waters of the United States the commission may require that the licensee construct without expense to the United States such lock or locks, booms, sluices, or other structures as may be necessary for navigation purposes, or in the event that the United States makes such installation itself then the licensee would be obliged to convey to the United States free of cost such of its lands as might be necessary, together with the right of passage through its dams and structures. The War Department is given control under the act of the pools created by dams in so far as required in the interest of navigation. The commission may also oblige the licensee who operates in a navigable water to furnish power free of cost for operation of navigation facilities and to maintain and operate at their own expense lights, signals, and fishways.

The licensee must begin construction within the time specified in the license, not exceeding two years from its date, and complete such part of the ultimate development within the time specified as shall in the judgment of the commission be sufficient to supply the needs of the then available market, and must from time to time construct such portion of the remainder of such development as the commission may direct so as to supply market demands until the full development shall have been made.

In issuing licenses for a minor part only of a complete project, or for a complete project of not more than 200 horsepower, the commission is empowered to waive such conditions of the act, except the license period of 50 years, as it may deem best.

The act provides that the United States may take over and operate any project during such time as the President deems that the safety of the United States demands it, for the purpose of manufacturing nitrates, explosives, or munitions of war, or for other purpose, the licensee to be properly recompensed when the property is returned.

The exercise of the right of eminent domain is given where the licensee is a municipal corporation or a public-service agent of a State or a public utility or service corporation, for the acquirement of necessary lands or property of others.

The act provides that contracts extending for periods beyond the date of termination of the license may be entered into by licensees, upon approval of the public-service commission of the State in which the sale or delivery of the power is made, or if sold or delivered in a State which has no such public-service commissions then upon the approval of the Federal power commission.

As a condition of the license all licensees are placed under the control of the public-service commission or other duly constituted agency of the State in which the service is rendered as to regulation of service and rates to be charged for power, or, if the State has no such agency, then the Federal power commission is given authority to regulate rates and service and also the amount and character of securities to be issued by licensees until such time as the State does provide such agency.

The bill provides that when the sale of power enters into interstate or foreign commerce, the rates charged and service rendered by licensees or their customers must be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and just to the consumer, and whenever any of the States directly concerned have not provided a public service commission or other agency having authority over rates, service, and issuance of securities, or where any of the States in which the service is rendered are unable to agree, then jurisdiction in these matters is conferred upon the Federal power commission.

Combinations, agreements, or understandings, expressed or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy, to restrain trade, or to fix, maintain, or increase prices for electrical energy or service, are prohibited. Heavy penalties are provided for noncompliance with the requirements of the act.

The bill expressly provides that nothing contained therein shall affect or interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control or use of water used for irrigation or for municipal purposes.

While the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act is reserved, it is provided that it shall not affect any license theretofore issued under its provisions.

The bill provides that nothing contained therein shall modify or repeal the act of Congress approved December 19, 1913, granting certain rights of way to the city of San Francisco, Calif., and the act repeals section 18 of the act approved August 8, 1917, making appropriations for the construction, and so forth, of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Upon the expiration of the license, which shall have been issued for a period of not to exceed 50 years, the act provides that the United States may—

(a) Upon two years' notice, purchase any project covered by any license, upon paying the net investment of the licensee not to exceed the fair value of the property taken, plus such reasonable damages, if any, to property of the licensee, dependent for its usefulness upon the continuance of the license, but not taken, as may be caused by the severance therefrom of property taken, and upon assuming all contracts entered into by the licensee with approval of the commission. The term "net investment" used as the basis of valuation in case of purchase, and as defined in the bill, is simply a "get-your-money-back proposition," and under it no licensee could secure more than the amount actually invested. Wishing to be sure of my ground in this matter, I submitted the question to the well-known firm of public accountants, Messrs. Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Co., of New York City, and received the following reply from them:

MARWICK, MITCHELL, PEAT & CO.,
ACCOUNTANTS AND AUDITORS,
79 WALL STREET,
New York, November 8, 1919.

HON. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At your request we have carefully considered the term "net investment" as defined in H. R. 3184, Senate Calendar 155, a bill "to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power," etc.

We have studied the term "net investment" as defined in section 3 in its relation, where applicable to the remainder of the bill, and especially as to the establishment of accounts by the licensee as set forth in section 4, subsection F. The maintenance of the property and establishment of depreciation and other reserves, as provided in section 10, subsections C and D, and as to the financial conditions provided for in sections 14 and 15, relating to the purchase of the property of the licensee if taken over by the Government or by a new licensee after the expiration of the original license.

We give it as our opinion that under the term "net investment," if the property of the licensee were purchased by the Government or by a new licensee after the expiration of the original license, the owners of the property would be entitled to receive not more than the actual amount invested. If this is the object of the bill, then we think that the exact wording used in defining "net investment" accurately meets the condition.

Yours, very truly, MARWICK, MITCHELL, PEAT & CO.

(b) In case the Government does not purchase the project, it may issue a new license to the original licensee or to a new licensee upon such terms and conditions as may be authorized by the then existing laws and regulations, upon condition that any new licensee shall, before taking possession, pay such amount and assume such contracts as the United States would be required to do if it purchased the project.

(c) In the event the United States does not at the expiration of the original license exercise its option to purchase the project, or if it does not tender a new license on reasonable terms to the original or to a new licensee, which is accepted, then the act provides that the commission shall issue from year to year an annual license to the then licensee under the terms of the original license until the property is purchased by the Government or by a new licensee or a new license is issued.

It will thus be seen that under the terms of the act the Federal Government has, through its commission, the first right to develop any of the water powers under its jurisdiction. Should the Federal Government elect not to do so, then States and municipalities are accorded a preference right to licenses on even terms over citizens, associations of citizens, or corporations organized under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof. Neither the Federal Government, the States, nor municipalities would pay any charges in event of their developing water power, and the entire burden of sustaining the cost of administration of the act, in addition to payment for use of Government lands, would fall upon such citizens and private corporations as cared to enter the field of water-power development.

While the Federal Government, the States, and municipalities would be privileged to develop and operate water powers without any restrictions, and would not be under the regulation of any governing body as to rates and service, yet if citizens and private corporations undertake the development of water powers they would, from the date of the signing of the preliminary permit until completion of the period of license, be under the close supervision of both Federal and State authorities, not only as to the rates they would charge for power and the character of service they would render the public but also as to every detail of their business. They would be faced with heavy penalties, the revocation of their permit, and loss of their property if they failed to conform strictly to the terms of the act. They would have to take all the chances of failure in a somewhat risky business, for dams sometimes go out through floods; and if after a generation of hard work they should have at last established a substantial business they would be faced with the probability that the Government might exercise its option and take over their project for itself, or allow some new licensee to do so, and they would receive only the actual amount invested and nothing for the good will created by years of hard work.

The option which is granted through this act to the Federal Government to take over the water powers of the country at cost, after they have been developed, gone through the early years of hardship and difficulty of securing a market for the energy, and have been placed upon a successful basis, will prove of enormous value if the water powers of the country are developed through private enterprise and capital. A friend of mine much interested in water-power development, in whom I have the utmost confidence, assures me that a private corporation might undoubtedly be organized which would pay a billion dollars for such an option if it could receive it. The Government, therefore, is securing a tremendous bargain if it can induce the development of the water powers of the country under the terms of this bill. And, indeed, such restrictive terms as I have set forth, and which are contained in this act, do not constitute a very attractive proposition to enterprising men and to capital; but, as I said before, water-power men tell me they can work under it, and so I hope we may soon pass it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I understand from the terms stated by the Senator that the basis is actual cost, without any addition for the use of money, without interest. Now, I can easily imagine a corporation or an individual starting with a plant and running a great many years without any return whatever; and in case a concern had established a plant of that kind, and had run along 10 or 15 years without making any return whatever, and merely paid operating expenses after that, would the Senator think that it was very much of an inducement for individuals or corporations to take up water power at any point where there was any question of success? Of course, it would lead to the development of the most promising propositions, but would it lead to taking up those less promising unless they were assured at least a small interest on their money?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am afraid it would not; but the provision relating to that subject has passed the House. It has passed the House several times, and that seems to be about the best provision that can be made; so the Commerce Committee of the Senate, instead of changing it, have reported that without any substantial change. As I say, while the men who are interested in water-power development think the terms are very onerous, yet they think they can work under the bill, and that there will be very substantial development under it.

Mr. WARREN. No doubt there will be; but I imagine that a great many of the locations that would be taken up if there were more liberal terms, conducing very greatly to the convenience of the public, will have to wait.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is probably true.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to make the suggestion that the Senator from Wyoming has made; but is it not natural to expect that? Unless we gave a bonus for somebody to develop a water power, nobody would develop it unless he was convinced, the same as in any other business venture, that by its development he was going to make a reasonable return, at least, on his investment. We could not expect all the water powers to be developed under any kind of a bill unless we gave people a bonus for development; and, indeed, do we want to develop a water power that will not pay? Is it not better that it be not developed?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If it will not pay under reasonable terms and conditions, of course it had better not be developed; that is true. The only question about it is whether these terms are not really too restrictive, and whether the definitions of the net investment and the return which is to come back to these people in case such propery is taken over are not too onerous.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, after a 50-year lease has expired.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt but that the public-service commission, in fixing the rates that they will permit these people to charge, will take into consideration without any question the lean years and the years when they had no return on the investment.

Mr. WARREN. We have to remember, when we consider an undertaking of that kind, the undertakings of our railroads. There are so few of our railroads that have not gone through the lean years, and, for that matter, receivers' hands, bankruptcy. As the Senator from Nebraska says, these matters will be taken up only by those who expect returns in the long run; but I think it will be fair for business men to expect, in nine out of ten cases, that there will be very lean years for quite a long time after the installation of new plants.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, however, that when the 50-year period has expired you will undoubtedly find that the returns, if it has been a successful venture, have been sufficient so that those who have invested their money have derived a reasonable interest upon their investment from the time they made it. Now, if the Government wanted to take it over and had to pay a bonus at that time above the investment, it seems to me that it would not induce the development of any power, because men will not go into it, even if there is going to be a bonus given by the Government, on the theory that at the end of 50 years they can make an advantageous sale to the Government. So I do not believe that Congress ought to be any more liberal at the expiration of the 50 years than they are under this bill. To me, the thing that seems weak in it is the commission.

The bill provides for a commission of Cabinet officers. I think it ought to be a permanent body of men who would become experts in that line after they have been in office a while, removed entirely from political control, taken entirely out of politics, and not confined to Members of the Cabinet, who, as everybody knows, change with every administration, and a good many times during an administration, and new men are put in who do not know anything about the business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree absolutely with the Senator's idea in regard to that; but, as I said a while ago, this seems to be the best provision that we can get in the hope of securing legislation, so the committee very reluctantly accepted the House provision with reference to that. It will be remembered that a bill covering this subject passed the Senate at the last Congress, and then was amended very materially and passed the House, and went to conference, and that the conference committee agreed and submitted a report which was adopted in the House, but was not adopted in the Senate. The House, in passing this bill, took as its basis substantially the conference report. The Senate committee, in the hope of getting legislation, changed that in just as few particulars as it felt that it was proper to do in the hope of getting legislation.

As I say, I agree absolutely with the Senator with reference to the commission; but the House, as we understand, is very firm upon the plan which is embodied in the bill, and so we did not deem it wise to suggest a change.

Mr. President, that is all I wish to say to-day. I desire to give notice to the Senate, however, for what it is worth, that I shall endeavor to have the water-power bill brought up for consideration immediately upon the disposition of the railroad bill. Of course, I do not know whether the railroad bill will get through before the holidays or not. I hope it will. I hope it will get through in time for us to consider the water-power legislation before the holidays; but, at any rate, just as soon as the railroad bill is disposed of I am going to do everything in my power to have the water-power legislation taken up and acted upon by the Senate.

GOLD CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] reported to the Senate this morning Senate bill 3458.

Mr. POMERENE. When was the report made?

Mr. SMOOT. This morning.

Mr. POMERENE. When was it taken up by the committee, if I may ask?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I introduced the bill on December 2. It is a bill to make gold certificates of the United States, payable to bearer on demand, legal tender. If there is any objection to it on the part of the Senator, I will not press it at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that I have any objection to it. I am very frank in saying that at the time we were framing the Federal reserve act I not only wanted these notes to be made legal tender but, if I could have had my way about it, I would have made the Federal reserve notes legal tender.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the reason why I am asking for the consideration of the bill is that Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, desires action upon it at the very earliest possible date. The holiday trade is on. The one and two dollar silver certificates are virtually withdrawn from circulation; and the business people of the country, from one end of it to the other, are begging the United States Government to send them one and two dollar bills. We are not in a condition to do so unless we pass this bill, as I explained the day that I introduced the bill; but if there is the least objection to it I will not ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. The bill was introduced on December 2. I have had no notice of any meeting of the committee, and I should prefer to hear what the members of the committee have to say who were present or had notice about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the report from the committee is a unanimous one, and was made this morning; but if the Senator does not want any action on the bill to-day, all he has to do is to say so.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I raise no objection to it, because I think, as I understand it, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3458) to make gold certificates of the United States, payable to bearer on demand, legal tender, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That gold certificates of the United States, payable to bearer on demand, shall be, and are hereby, made legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts which are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was present at the meeting of the committee when the bill was considered. It is a very excellent bill, so far as I can understand. We did not have time to get a report from the department on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is a report, and it is filed with the bill. I am going to ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to have that done, and I am taking the assurance of the Senator from Utah with regard to the attitude of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a doubt about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is a good measure.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may not the report be read, if there is a report here?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask what has become of the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked unanimous consent that the bill might be considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not going to object, but I do not want the unfinished business to lose its place.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. I can assure the Senator on that point.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have just received word that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] would like to be present when the bill is taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the remarks of the senior Senator from Colorado the other day were rather of a facetious nature.

Mr. POMERENE. The word I have is that he desires to be heard on the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I will ask that no further consideration of the bill be had at this time and that it go to the calendar for the present.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I prepared five amendments to the original Cummins bill, Senate bill 2906, and they were printed. I find that the necessity for a number of those amendments has been done away with by the provisions of the bill now being considered—Senate bill 3288. So at this time I do not desire to have them considered, unless the Senator from Iowa desires that they be disposed of. I do want to state, however, that during the consideration of this measure I want to move to strike out section 10. If that is successful, I will follow it with other motions with regard to the boards provided for in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no amendment pending, so far as I know. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. There are five amendments printed and on the table is what I mean; there are six printed and on the table, as a matter of fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know whether the Senator from Kansas desired to offer one or more of them.

Mr. CURTIS. I say I do not at this time unless the Senator from Iowa wants to dispose of them. I would rather explain my objection to this provision of the bill and take up the other matters afterwards.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, experience can alone disclose the extent of the benefits which new agencies bring to the world and the evil results from abuses of power or the neglect of duty can only be learned from their actual occurrence. This has clearly been demonstrated in the development and the management of the great railway systems in this country.

When the railroads were first built, no one foresaw their wonderful benefits, their growth, their power, and their influence; and no one dreamed of the abuse of power, the corrupt practices, and the neglect of duty which has occurred in the management of many of the great lines.

The good results should be preserved, faithful and good management should be encouraged, and the neglect of duty and the abuses of power should be prevented.

The country has seen the results of the different kinds of management of the great railroad systems; they have seen some of the best roads so poorly, if not criminally, managed that they were wrecked or thrown into bankruptcy; they have seen favoritism shown to great corporations; and they have seen one community built up at the expense of another. That there were actual abuses of various kinds in the management of many of the great lines will not be disputed, while, on the other hand, the country has seen some of the systems grow great and bring immeasureable benefits to different sections of the country through honest and fair management. The railroads have been a great benefit to the people of the various sections of the United States, but under good management and proper Government control and regulation they can and will be of greater benefit.

When our country became a party to the great World War the Government took over most of the railroads and has been operating them since January 1, 1918. In that time it has cost the Government in actual appropriations the sum of $1,250,000,000. The chairman of the committee says that it is estimated that the deficit will be about $650,000,000 for the two years. At this time no one can tell the amount of claims that will be filed. Many of the roads are claiming they have been greatly damaged and have suffered great loss in business. To say the Government operation has been unsatisfactory and extremely expensive would be putting it very mildly. The time has come to turn the roads back to their owners, and it is the duty of Congress to enact such legislation in regard to their control and regulation as will require the roads to give the public the service to which they are entitled and to prevent, as far as possible, the recurrence of well-known abuses that were practiced under the old managements. In short, the roads should be operated for the public welfare.

It has been demonstrated that the evils of the past in railroad management, such as the practice of discrimination, stock watering, rebating, pooling, and railroad wrecking are not necessary, and the roads whose managers have followed such practices have suffered great losses. It has also been demonstrated that honest operation of railroads, good service to the traveling and shipping public, fair and just dealing with those who patronize the roads, reasonable wages, for the services rendered, to the employees will bring prosperity to the roads and provide ample return on actual and necessary investments. The ultimate power in this country still rests with the people, and they, through their representatives, may exert regulating control over the corporations created by the Government, and the Congress has the power and the right to bring such corporations into full harmony with commercial equality and public justice.

The question of providing for the turning of the roads back and the regulation of their operation in the future is now before the Congress, and it is for Congress to decide what legislation is needed to preserve the usefulness of the railroads to the public, what will enable the roads to do justice in the way of pay to the great army of men and women in their employ, to give the public good and efficient service, and at the same time protect the legitimate, honest, and actual investments of capital in the railroad properties of the country.

There are now virtually two plans before the Senate, one the Senate bill and the other the House bill. Both have been carefully considered by the committees having charge of them, and the House bill has come to the Senate with the approval of a good majority of that body, and it seems to me that the Senate should adopt the plan which will cause the least interference consistent with freedom of action and at the same time guarantee protection to the public. This can be done by enacting legislation which will meet existing conditions and by providing for such regulation and control as will bring fair and just treatment to all concerned.

It is not my purpose to discuss the bills in detail. That can be better done by members of the committee who have devoted much time and study to the question. It seems to me, however, that too many boards and commissions are provided in the measures. It would be better to vest the power and authority of the various boards in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has been in existence for many years; it has considered many of the questions which are bound to arise under any legislation that may be enacted; it has the confidence of the people; and it is better equipped to consider and settle railway questions than any new board could possibly be.

There should be but one commission, and it should have full power to settle all disputes arising between the roads and the public and all questions of wages and labor conditions that can not be settled by the man and the management.

I doubt if the plans for the settlement of labor disputes suggested in the House or Senate bills will be successful. If you will read the sections covering this question, you will find that the men and the management are given the same number of representatives on the various boards.

The Senate bill provides for the creation of a committee on wages and working conditions and three regional boards of adjustment for the purpose of settling disputes and controversies between the railways and their employees.

The committee of wages and working conditions is to be composed of eight members, four to represent labor and four to represent the carriers. This committee is empowered to hear and determine cases on appeal from the boards.

The three boards of adjustment are to consist of six members each and are made up as follows:

Three of the members of each board are to represent labor and three are to represent the railways. The bill also creates a transportation board, which is to be composed of five members to be appointed by the President. This board is given great power, but it seems to me that the work assigned to it could be assigned to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Each member of this board is to receive a salary of $12,000, and it is empowered to employ assistants, clerks, stenographers, attorneys, and other assistants. There is transferred to it some 10 or more subjects that are now under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It would be better to let these duties remain where they are rather than to build up another board with an army of employees. Decisions of the various labor boards and the committee on wages and working conditions are to be certified to the transportation board and shall take effect when approved by it, and the decision of this board is final.

The members of the committee on wages and working conditions are each to be paid a salary of $7,500 per annum, and the members of the boards of regional adjustment are each to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. The committee and each board may appoint a secretary and the necessary employees.

Under the House bill the railway board of adjustment No. 1 consists of 8 members, 4 to be selected by the carriers and 1 from each of the four organizations of the employees.

Board No. 2 is to consist of 12 members, 6 selected by the carriers and 1 each from the six organizations of employees.

Board No. 3 shall consist of 8 members, 4 to be selected by the carriers and 1 from each of the four organizations of employees.

Matters that can not be settled by the railway board of adjustment may be referred to the commission on labor disputes. There are three such commissions, and they are made up in the same manner as are the railway boards of adjustment.

The representatives being interested, there is great danger of a deadlock, and it seems to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission would be disinterested and would be in a much better position to determine what would be right, fair, and just to the roads and their employees.

If the questions of wages and labor conditions are not to be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if settlements of grievances, controversies, and disputes arising between the officials of the railroad and its employees can not be handled and settled in the usual manner, then a board of disinterested persons should be created with power to hear, settle, and finally dispose of the question. The board so created should be composed of men of high standing and wholly disinterested, so that the rights of the public, the employees, and the railroads will be fairly, justly, and finally settled.

In the past it has been the policy of the Government to refuse to permit railroads to enter into combinations, but the Senate bill changes this policy, and instead of making combinations illegal, it requires the railroads to consolidate into not less than 20 nor more than 35 separate and distinct systems.

I have grave doubts about the provisions of the pending bill which provide for consolidation of railroads. I fear they will prevent competition. The legislation enacted should guarantee full and free competition. The people have freely voted bonds to assist in the building of railroads for the purpose of having competing lines, and the principle of competition should be maintained so that natural laws of trade may not be interfered with.

I do not believe in pooling agreements, because such agreements can mean but one thing, and that is the suspension of competition. There is no denying the fact that just as far as pooling is permitted, just that far competition is avoided. The question of pooling has been before the courts a number of times, and it has met with universal condemnation.

The law should prohibit abuses and leave legitimate investments open to all. Authority should be given the Interstate Commerce Commission to restrain the railroads whenever they threaten the public interest. The roads are chartered for the public welfare.

The people ask that all persons be given equal rights, and that the service rendered by the railways shall be performed impartially, and that the charges for such services shall be fair and reasonable and based upon the same standard of cost. The management and operation of railroads with due regard for the rights of the public is needed now more than ever before. The farmer who has grain and stock to ship is entitled to the same treatment that is afforded the largest corporation in the land; the rights of the small cooperative elevator are as sacred as are the rights of the biggest corporate owned elevator. In short, the right of the humblest shipper or traveler should be guarded against the encroachment of the most powerful.

The Congress should not enact a law which will prohibit capital from investing in any legitimate and lawful enterprise, for to do so would be to destroy the freedom of trade, and while the legislation enacted should not be oppressive to capital legitimately and actually invested in railroad property, yet it is clearly the duty of Congress to protect the public against abuses.

I have studied the two measures very carefully, and I find that each has some very good provisions, but I think some amendments are necessary. There are some provisions of the House bill which I prefer to the Senate bill. I hope some measure will be acted upon very soon, for all concerned have a right to know what legislation is going to be enacted.

If possible, I would like to see the best parts of each bill retained; this may be done upon agreement and recommendation of the conferees.

I might state in conclusion that I have prepared and had printed another amendment in reference to those boards in case they are retained. I hope they may not be retained. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has prepared a substitute which I think will give better satisfaction than the provision of the House bill or the Senate bill or the amendment prepared by me. That amendment, I suppose, will be taken up on Monday or Tuesday when the bill is again up for consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Do I understand that the Senator from Kansas desires to offer the amendment to which he has just referred?

Mr. CURTIS. I move to strike out section 10 of the bill, but I ask not to be required to take it up now because the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance are waiting for me. If that amendment may be pending, I move to strike out section 10.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am, of course, very much opposed to striking out section 10, but I think in view of all the circumstances we can not proceed with the consideration of the bill this afternoon. There are two or three Senators who desire to address the Senate generally upon the bill who are not prepared to do so this afternoon. I believe that time probably will be conserved if just now I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GOLD CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3458) to make gold certificates of the United States payable to bearer on demand legal tender.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has already been read.

Mr. POMERENE. The report of the committee has not been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the committee has not been read.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. McLEAN from the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3458) to make gold certificates of the United States, payable to bearer on demand, legal tender, having considered the same, report favorably thereon, with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The fact that silver certificates have been withdrawn from circulation and the silver dollars received in exchange have been broken up and sold as bullion for a price considerably above their coinage value has caused a marked shortage in notes of the smaller denominations.

Your committee is informed by the Treasury Department that the demand for one and two dollar notes is becoming more and more urgent every day. The one and two dollar Treasury notes can be issued only in exchange for unfit Treasury notes and Treasury notes of larger denominations. The Treasury notes of denominations above $2 now outstanding total $174,453,466, but these notes are largely retained by the banks because of their legal-tender quality.

It is urged by the Secretary of the Treasury in a communication to your committee, which is printed below, that these Treasury notes will be released by the banks if the gold certificates, payable on demand, are made legal tender, and, as these gold certificates can be redeemed in gold on demand, there would seem to be no good reason why this should not be done.

In addition to the need for an increase in the notes of small denominations to meet the ordinary trade requirements, it is claimed that it is difficult for persons desiring to make legal tender on contracts to get legal-tender notes for that purpose.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 5, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Answering your inquiry as to the position of the Treasury with reference to Senate bill, now before your committee, which proposes to make gold certificates payable on demand a legal tender for all debts and dues, public and private, I would state that I am in favor of this bill and hope very much it will be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment. The passage of this bill would not change in any way the present reserve situation, for section 19 of the Federal reserve act provides that all lawful reserves of national banks must be carried not in cash in their own vaults but exclusively in the shape of collected balances with the Federal reserve banks. Nor does the bill propose to give the legal tender quality to $10,000 gold certificates, which are payable to order and of which there are outstanding $654,670,000.

I think it is wise to confine the provisions of the bill to gold certificates payable to bearer on demand, thus avoiding any question as to the validity of indorsements, which would arise in the case of the order certificates. On October 31, 1919, the net amount of gold certificates in circulation was $424,439,732, the denominations of which range from $10 to $5,000. As these certificates are receipts of the Treasury for gold deposited with it and as each certificate must be redeemed in gold on demand, there seems to be no good reason why a gold certificate payable to bearer on demand and which can command the actual gold at any time should not be made a legal tender for all public and private dues. United States gold certificates are issued under the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the acts of March 4, 1907, March 2, 1911, and June 12, 1916.

There is a most pressing need for notes of the smaller denominations. On October 31, 1919, there were outstanding notes of $1 and $2 denominations as follows:

United States notes (legal tenders)	$152,560,518
Treasury notes of 1890	525,832
Federal reserve bank notes	220,865,800
National bank notes	505,464
Silver certificates	121,869,917
Total	496,327,531

During the past two years there has been a heavy demand for silver, which has been met in part by the sale as bullion of standard silver dollars, as authorized under the act of April 23, 1918, commonly known as the Pittman Act. This act authorizes, also, the issue of Federal reserve bank notes in denominations of $1 and $2, which are secured by United States bonds and Treasury certificates and are taxed as national-bank notes are taxed. These notes, however, can be issued only as silver dollars, are sold as bullion, and can not increase the volume of circulation.

The demand for silver has resulted in a marked increase in the price of silver bullion, and quotations during the past 10 days have ranged between $1.29 and $1.37½ per ounce, and the average maintained was considerably above $1.2929, which is the coinage value. In consequence of the enhancement in the value of silver metal, silver dollars are now worth more as bullion than as currency, and silver certificates, which are redeemable in silver dollars, are fast disappearing from circulation. A large and immediate additional supply of one and two dollar notes is absolutely necessary to supply industrial and commercial needs. The Treasury has on hand an adequate supply of United States notes, or legal tenders, of the denominations of $1 and $2, but can issue them only in exchange for unfit notes or for notes of larger denominations. I transmit herewith a table, from which you will see that there are outstanding notes, or legal tenders, of denominations above $2, $175,453,466, which are held in large part by the banks because of their legal tender quality.

Should the pending bill become a law, the banks would no longer have any object in holding the United States legal-tender notes and would, without doubt, immediately release them to the Treasury in exchange for $1 and $2 notes. The supply of gold certificates would be more than ample for the needs of those desiring to make legal tenders on contracts or debts, and the gold certificates will be found much more convenient for such purposes than gold coin itself.

The demand for one and two dollar bills is becoming more urgent every day, and in order to enable the Treasury to meet these demands it is important that the pending bill be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment.

Very truly, yours,

CARTER GLASS,
Secretary.

Treasury Department, Office of the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the passage of the bill. I think it is a reflection upon the Treasury Department that they did not ask for this legislation long ago. There is no sound reason, at least in this day of financial operations, that can be urged why we should have gold as a legal tender and not have the certificates which represent that gold a legal tender. If it were within my power I would add Federal reserve notes as well.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the one significant feature of this measure is the time when presented for consideration. It comes when silver is worth in the market very much more than gold and when gold is the cheaper of the two metals. We are about, therefore, to bestow a faculty and virtue upon the representative of unsound money. There can be no doubt about that fact, because I have listened to its assertion iterated and reiterated for many years in the past, and particularly during the very exciting campaign of 1896.

In those days I ventured to question the soundness of the doctrine proclaimed with vehemence and an earnestness that frequently bordered upon personal resentment that only money worth 100 cents to the dollar should pass current or receive the sanction of governmental authority. In those days we were all assured that gold was the only thing in the world endowed with an absolute, constant, unvarying, unchanging, positive value. It was like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, exempt from human influence, from the effect of human industry, from the laws of supply and demand; and even the quantity in circulation in no way affected or impaired its actual or relative value.

We now confront the situation where the mutations of time have brought revenge, and the regnant metal of the hour is the despised white metal of the past, to which the doors of the mint were long ago shut and to suggest the reopening of which subjected one to the charge of idiocy or of lunacy or of knavery or of all those undesirable qualities.

I really think the word "gold" should be stricken out of the bill and the word silver inserted, because not otherwise can we keep faith with the public creditor, not otherwise can we pay him in sound money, not otherwise can we preserve the national honor. The fact is so patent, so mathematically demonstrable, that it is only necessary to state it when it will be generally accepted.

Let me, therefore, Mr. President, warn those responsible for this movement to give a legal-tender value to depreciated paper, that they are flooding the country with more unsound money, and the poor creditor, obliged to accept these certificates, will think twice before commending either the wisdom or the integrity of the Senate of the United States. It is a situation which I deplore.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. But, notwithstanding that result, in keeping with my past reputation as an advocate of dishonest money, I feel constrained to vote for the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Colorado feel that some apologies are due to Mr. Bryan for attacking the position he took of paying debts with dishonest silver dollars when we now pay them in depreciated gold dollars?

Mr. THOMAS. If I may fall into the vernacular, I think it is Bryan's time to "crow." I notice he has been addressing some rather embarrassing queries to the magnates in the financial world in New York, some of whose answers are very characteristic. He is still "a dangerous citizen," whose financial views are too pernicious to demand serious consideration. My own judgment is that to Mr. Bryan and those of us whose mental limitations caused us to support his views it is a matter of considerable satisfaction to know that, even though the period may be brief, silver has come into its own and the standard gold dollar created by the act of 1900 is now the short-legged dollar of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I am through.

Mr. KING. Having listened to the exquisite piece of irony and satire of the Senator, I should like to propound a question to him before he concludes; and, in serious good faith, I will ask the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. I have been speaking in good faith.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator from Colorado always speaks in good faith, but in a satirical vein he has, it seems to me, to use the vernacular of the street, "rubbed it into" the advocates of the gold standard. But the question I was about to propound to the Senator is this: The Senator will recall that when one of his illustrious predecessors from the State of Colorado was here he very earnestly sought the passage of a measure that would permit an international conference with a view to establishing silver as one of the bases of our financial system.

Mr. THOMAS. He passed that measure.

Mr. KING. He passed the resolution for such an investigation, but we did not secure international bimetallism. I was about to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he did not think it was a good time now to try to secure international bimetallism?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the beginning of the special session of this Congress I introduced a resolution for the appointment of a commission to consider and, if possible, agree with other nations on some basis for regulating the rate of exchange between gold and silver using countries. If that is done, without regard to the ratio of exchange, it will steady those fluctuations, to the mutual benefit and prosperity of both the silver-using and the gold-using nations.

All nations are now nominally gold-using nations, but silver is just as much the currency of India and of China and practically of all the yellow races of the world as it ever was. Unquestionably, however, the present time is very appropriate for meeting and, by adjustment, doing away with that situation which has prevailed ever since silver fell below par.

My precedessor, the late Senator Wolcott, secured the enactment of a joint resolution, and its approval by President McKinley, providing for such regulation of exchanges which would very largely afford the equivalent of the fixity of ratios. That joint resolution received in the Senate, among others, the support of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. Senator Wolcott was made the chairman of the commission appointed by President McKinley for that purpose. In his autobiography or reminiscences Senator Hoar gives an interesting account of the tribulations of that commission and the difficulties which it encountered in the effort to secure recognition of its purposes in Great Britain. Senator Wolcott upon his return deliberately charged upon the floor of the Senate that his mission had been defeated by the intrigue of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, and in his very impetuous and eloquent manner denounced the interference not only as an act of bad faith, but which should be visited with much more than mere denunciation. I am satisfied that if Senator Wolcott had had a free hand, if the financial interests of the Government and of the country had acquiesced, even passively, in his effort, he would have accomplished his great and beneficent object.

I think the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is a most pertinent one, and it is my intention, Mr. President, as soon as the unfinished business is disposed of, to address the Senate upon the metallic-money world situation, the need of the regulation of exchange, and the ease with which, in view of the present value of silver, it can now be accomplished.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

METHOD OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2756) to prescribe the method of capital punishment in the District of Columbia. It merely provides for a change in the method of inflicting the death penalty in the District. The bill has been favorably reported from the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the bill, it merely changes the mode of capital punishment from hanging to electrocution.

Mr. DIAL. It changes it from hanging to electrocution, adopting the modern method employed in various States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1920, the mode of capital punishment in the District of Columbia shall be by the process commonly known as electrocution. The punishment of death shall be inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convict a current of electricity of sufficient intensity to cause death and the application of such current shall be continued until such convict is dead.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and required, on the approval of this act by the President, to provide a death chamber and necessary apparatus for inflicting the death penalty by electrocution, to pay the cost thereof out of any funds available and not otherwise appropriated, to designate an executioner and necessary assistants, not exceeding three in number, and to fix the fees thereof for services, which shall be paid out of any funds available and not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That upon the conviction of any person in the District of Columbia of a crime the punishment of which is death, it shall be the duty of the presiding judge to sentence such convicted person to death according to the terms of this act, and to make such sentence in writing, which shall be filed with the papers in the case against such convicted person, and a certified copy thereof shall be transmitted, by the clerk of the court in which such sentence is pronounced, to the superintendent of the District Jail, not less than 10 days prior to the time fixed in the sentence of the court for the execution of the same.

SEC. 4. That at the execution of the death penalty as herein prescribed there shall be present the following persons, and no more, to wit:

The executioner and his assistants; the physician of the prison and one other physician if the condemned person so desires; the condemned person's counsel and relatives, not exceeding three, if they so desire; the prison chaplain and such other ministers of the gospel, not exceeding two, as may attend by desire of the condemned; the superintendent of the prison, or, in the event of his disability, a deputy designated by him; and not fewer than three nor more than five respectable citizens whom the superintendent of the prison shall designate, and, if necessary to insure their attendance, shall subpœna to be present. The fact of execution shall be certified by the prison physician and the executioner to the clerk of the court in which sentence was pronounced, which certificate shall be filed by the clerk with the papers in the case.

SEC. 5. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it will be necessary to adopt an amendment as to the date when the bill shall take effect. As reported it provides that it shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1920. I suggest that we will have to fix a later date, and I move to amend by striking out the word "January" and inserting the word "June."

Mr. SMOOT. Why should the date be placed so far ahead?

Mr. DIAL. In order that the bill may have an opportunity to pass the other House and become a law. Any other date that will afford the necessary opportunity will suit me, but I imagine that it will not be possible to secure the enactment of the bill by January 1. If the Senator has any suggestion to make in regard to the date, I will be glad to have him make it. I will suggest, if that is agreeable to the Senator, that the date be made March 1. I hope it will be possible to get the bill through by that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 1, line 3, after the word "of," it is proposed to strike out "January" and insert "March."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator having the bill in charge. Has there been a recommendation of the officials of the District of Columbia in regard to this measure?

Mr. DIAL. Yes, sir. It was referred to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and they favored it unanimously.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the Senator who offered this bill believes that electrocution is a more humane method of dealing with those upon whom the sentence of death has been passed than is hanging. I want to ask the Senator whether or not those who have made a study of the different methods employed in carrying out the death penalty have recommended in favor of electrocution rather than shooting or hanging or any other method that now obtains in the United States?

Mr. DIAL. I do not know, Mr. President, of any extensive study made or report submitted with regard to it, but the method of inflicting the death penalty proposed by the bill obtains in many States of the Union, for instance, Indiana, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, and possibly other States. It occurs to me that it is more humane to electrocute a person than it is to hang him. It is a mere matter of advancement and progress, I take it. I hope that none of the people who reside in the District of Columbia will have the death penalty inflicted upon them, but if that shall be necessary we are trying to make it as comfortable for them as possible.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that the method proposed by this bill has any more elements of humaneness in dealing with those who are to be executed than other methods now prevailing in the United States. I have talked with a number of men who have been present at electrocutions, and a majority of those with whom I have spoken have had no hesitancy in saying that they regarded hanging or shooting as humane as, and some of them said more humane than, electrocution. It seems to me that there is nothing that could be more frightful than to strap a man in a chair and adjust the mechanism there provided so that the current may pass through his body without obstruction and destroy his life. Nothing could be more frightful than that. It seems to me shooting or hanging would be as humane, and perhaps more humane, than electrocution.

I voted against this measure in the committee because I did not believe that the method provided possessed sufficient merit over the present method to commend itself to the judgment of the Senate. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but, with my present information, humanity being the reason why this bill is urged, and feeling that electrocution is not more humane than the present method of inflicting the death penalty in the District, I shall not give it my support.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I repeat, the bill has received the favorable consideration of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to whom it was referred and who made a favorable report on it. A large majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia also favored this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2902.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield for that purpose, if there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. This bill has been on the calendar for a long time. It merely permits the signatures on circulating notes to be engraved or written. I think the bill has already passed the House. There is no possible objection to it. It was introduced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield if there is no objection to the bill. If it leads to any discussion, however, I must object.

Mr. McLEAN. If there is any objection, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFCER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2902. Is there objection?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill; but if this is to go on, and we are to continue to attempt to pass bills, I am going to begin objecting with the next one. I do not believe we ought to pass bills with only six or seven Senators in the Chamber; but I will not object to the consideration of this one.

Mr. McLEAN. I think, if the Senator will listen to the reading of the bill, he will have no objection.

Mr. KENYON. I have been informed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] as to what it is, and I am not going to object; but I do think that the practice of passing bills in the middle of the afternoon, with only five or six Senators present, is wrong.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2902) to amend section 5182, Revised Statutes of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5182, Revised Statutes of the United States, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5182. Any association receiving circulating notes under this title may, if its promise to pay such notes on demand is expressed thereon attested by the written or engraved signatures of the president or vice president and the cashier thereof in such manner as to make them obligatory promissory notes payable on demand at its place of business, issue and circulate the same as money. Such written or engraved signatures of the president or vice president and the cashier of such association may be attached to such notes either before or after the receipt of such notes by such association. And such notes shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States, except duties on imports; and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, why not adjourn, so that we can have a morning hour?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], desires a recess.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there are many Senators who have some business they desire to transact in the morning hour. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just come in, and I am certain that under the circumstances he will favor an adjournment rather than a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will change the motion and move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 8, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

May they have the satisfaction of working together with God, ever keeping in mind the great principles of Thy Word, the assurance written in promises large, promises that have ever been kept, that if we are faithful to Thee we will work out a destiny fit for those who are made in Thine own image. Grant us Thy grace to-day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PAYMENT FOR COAL DIVERTED IN TRANSIT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, transmitting, pursuant to a resolution of 3d instant, a report of the arrangements that have been made or will be made for the prompt payment for coal diverted in transit from the original consignee. The communication will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, December 8, 1919.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution 243, directing report to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment of the arrangements that have been made or will be made for the prompt payment of coal diverted in transit from the original consignee, I beg to state as follows:

The Railroad Administration has been acting as the agency of the Fuel Administration in distributing coal to those users entitled thereto under the priorities prescribed by the Fuel Administration, and in performing this difficult work has been particularly solicitous to facilitate the promptest payment for coal by the users thereof to which the same might be diverted. Arrangements have been made to make sure that such users pay for the coal and pay for it promptly, and imperative instructions have been issued and reiterated that coal taken for railroad use should be promptly paid for. In addition, the Railroad Administration has cooperated with the Federal Reserve Board in adopting methods to facilitate the borrowing of money by the operators upon coal in transit. Further than this, the Railroad Administration has requested the coal operators to give specific information as to any mines actually in difficulty on account of inability to collect their coal bills with sufficient promptness, and in the only instances which have accordingly been reported to the Railroad Administration it has made arrangements to purchase for railroad use enough coal and make immediate payment therefor to furnish the operators affected sufficient funds to meet their immediate needs. The details of these various instructions and steps are as follows:

On October 31, 1919, Dr. H. A. Garfield, United States Fuel Administrator, issued an order reinstating his order of January 14, 1918, which read in part as follows:

"All shipments of coal, whether f. o. b. mines or otherwise, and all shipments of coke f. o. b. ovens or at place of storage or otherwise, shall be made subject to the diversion of such coal or coke by the United States Fuel Administrator or any persons acting under his authority to any persons or consumers and for any of the purposes heretofore or hereafter authorized by him. The title of the purchaser, consignee, or consumer, in the case of any such shipments of coal or coke, which by custom or law might become vested at the time and place of such shipment, shall from and after the effective date hereof be subject to the condition that the coal or coke so shipped may be diverted as aforesaid, and that in case of any such diversion the title and interest of such purchaser, consignee, or consumer with respect to any coal or coke so diverted shall be completely divested and terminated and his liability to pay therefor shall cease."

The Fuel Administrator by the said order of October 31, 1919, also designated the Director General of Railroads and his representatives "to carry into effect said order of January 14, 1918, and to make such diversions of coal as the railroads under his direction may, as common carriers, have in their possession, as may be necessary in the present emergency to provide for the requirements of the country in order of priority set out in the preference list included in the order of the United States Fuel Administrator May 25, 1918."

On October 31, 1919, the Director General of Railroads telegraphed all regional directors of the United States Railroad Administration, in part, as follows:

"When commercial coal is diverted to other than original consignee, promptly notify shipper and original consignee of each car and keep adequate record for later settlement. Coal diverted for commercial uses shall be paid for in accordance with the Fuel Administrator's order dated January 14, 1918. In order to insure payments, coal shall be diverted for commercial use to such applicants only who shall satisfy the Federal or general manager of their financial responsibility, or who shall deposit a certified check or other satisfactory security in such sum that will insure full payment for any coal furnished. The applicant shall make definite written obligation to pay the shipper for the coal promptly upon presentation of bill."

On November 3, 1919, the central coal committee which the Director General of Railroads appointed at Washington to supervise the distribution of coal telegraphed all regional directors as follows:

"The question which is being raised and which is deserving of immediate consideration is the prompt payment for coal confiscated by the railroads for fuel purposes. The point is made that mines which continue to operate will have difficulty in meeting their pay roll if payment for such coal is withheld for any considerable length of time.

"The matter is, therefore, brought to your attention, with suggestion that arrangements be made with all your roads for the promptest possible payment for coal that is confiscated for railroad use."

On November 3 and 4, after representation by the National Coal Association and the Pocahontas Coal Operators' Association that coal operators were apprehensive about securing payment promptly for diverted coal, and in some instances that the operators might not receive such payment with sufficient promptness to enable them to meet their pay rolls and other production expenses, the central coal committee suggested that the operators in each district should interest themselves in this matter in their district, and arrange so that operators whose mines were working should be able to secure the needed financial assistance by borrowing money from banks against outstanding coal. It was suggested by the National Coal Association that payment for diverted coal would be facilitated if the railroads showed on the coal waybills the selling price of the coal when advised of this by the shippers, and on November 6 instructions were given all regional directors to see that this was done.

In order to protect consumers who might receive diverted coal from undue cost due to out-of-route movement which might occur on account of the exigencies of the situation Director Chambers, of the Division of Traffic, United States Railroad Administration, on November 12 notified all regional directors as follows:

"It has been decided that where coal is taken by the Railroad Administration and subsequently assigned to a consignee that the rate of freight to be charged such consignee should be the published freight rate from the mine at which the coal originated to the destination of such consignee regardless of any out-of-route or back haul which may have been involved in the movement while under charge of the Railroad Administration.

"I am sending you this information so that in case inquiry should be made you would be advised of this policy."

On November 20, after being advised by the representative of the National Coal Association that apparently some operators did not know of the arrangenfent permitting the price of coal to be shown on coal waybills, instructions were therefore sent to regional directors by the central coal committee to have agents advise shippers in writing of this arrangement.

On November 26 instructions were sent to the regional directors that as far as practicable they should dispose of the oldest coal on hand first when making diversions or deliveries.

On November 28 the central coal committee, on being advised that some operators were claiming to be financially embarrassed and this arrangement was desirable to assist them in securing their money, telegraphed the regional directors as follows:

"To avoid financial embarrassment to shippers of diverted coal and consequent restriction of production regional coal committees and Federal managers should be instructed to insure prompt payment of bills by final consignees by making delivery of coal conditional on such payment if necessary. Arrangement should also be made that shippers are immediately advised of consignees to whom their coal is diverted. Every effort should also be made to pay for railway fuel with utmost promptness. This repeats previous instruction and is sent to you to emphasize the importance of giving the subject special consideration."

On being informed that banks in coal-field districts were being drained of funds through loans to coal operators conferences were held with representatives of the coal operators and later with the Federal Reserve Board to see what arrangements could be made to relieve the situation. As a result of this the arrangements covered by the inclosed press notice of December 3 were made, and representatives of banks and operators agreed that this would be of material assistance.

Again, on December 3 telegraphic instructions were sent to all regional directors to put into effect at once the arrangements for issuing such form of receipt for coal shipments.

Further, on the same day the following telegraphic instructions were sent all regional directors:

"See my telegram, November 28, advising that prompt payment for diverted as well as contract coal was necessary to avoid financial embarrassment of shippers and consequent restriction of production. Also that every effort should be made to pay for railway fuel with utmost promptness. Our information is that operators are not receiving remittances promptly, and instructions should be given by you to have all bills prepared, vouchered, and paid immediately on receipt. That is of utmost importance."

At various times since this matter was brought up representatives of the coal operators have been requested to furnish information as to specific instances where there was a possibility the mines would be unable to obtain funds to meet pay roll and other operating expenses, and no such specific instances were reported to the central coal committee prior to December 4, when they were advised that two operators located on the line of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad were in such straitened circumstances that a shutdown might possibly occur. Arrangements were made with the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad to purchase for railroad use and pay for immediately sufficient coal now being produced by these operators to furnish them sufficient funds to meet their immediate needs. In addition to written and telegraphic instructions sent to regional directors, the question of prompt payment for railroad coal and prompt notice to shippers of diverting of commercial coal has been made the subject of frequent telephone conversations with interested railroad officers.

The central coal committee has arranged to secure daily reports of the number of cars of diverted coal and information as to whether or not shippers have been notified so that delinquencies can be corrected.

As may be seen from the foregoing, the central coal committee and all representatives of the Director General of Railroads have appreciated the necessity and desirability of prompt payment for coal diverted, and every effort has been made and will be made to secure such prompt payment.

Truly, yours,

WALKER D. HINES,
Director General of Railroads.

PRESS STATEMENT.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1919.

Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, to-day authorized the following statement:

"The United States Railroad Administration is paying promptly and even on shorter time than under normal conditions for coal consigned to or diverted to railroads under Federal control for their own use. But because of some unusually long hauls to supply coal in portions of the country where production of coal has ceased, and because of other diversions, there are some inevitable delays in delivery to other consignees or divertees, and consequently there are some delays in payment for coal by the consignees receiving this coal so diverted. In order to remedy this situation and appreciating the necessity of coal operators who are now producing coal getting their money promptly in order to meet pay rolls and other production expenses, the Railroad Administration has arranged to give such coal operators a certificate evidencing the fact of the loading of cars and delivery to the railroads for transportation of such coal as they are producing and loading, so that such coal operators can secure such necessary money from banks on the basis of their notes supported by such certificates.

"This matter having been taken up with the Federal Reserve Board on the question of whether such notes are eligible for rediscount, the Federal Reserve Board has sent the following formal communication to the Railroad Administration:

"'The Federal Reserve Board has received and considered your letter of December 2, asking to be advised whether or not a Federal reserve bank may properly rediscount a note drawn by a shipper of coal under the following circumstances:

"'Because of the diversions of coal pursuant to the authority and order of the United States Fuel Administrator issued in consequence of the strike of the bituminous coal miners, it appears that shippers of coal are not receiving payment for the coal shipped as promptly as is customary when coal moves in its normal channels. In order to provide funds to cover the current cost of production it is contemplated that a shipper of coal issue his note accompanied by a certificate of the Director General of Railroads who is distributing coal for and on behalf of the United States Fuel Administrator, substantially to the effect that the shipper has loaded coal on cars of a specified railroad; that the coal is in the possession of that railroad to be transported, delivered, or diverted by the Director General of Railroads or his representatives subject to the order of the United States Fuel Administrator and that the shipper is to be paid for the coal by the consignee or divertee as provided in the orders of the United States Fuel Adminjstrator. The proceeds of the note of the shipper are to be used by him for the payment of the current costs of production.

"'In the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board such a note, the proceeds of which are to be used by the drawer for the payment of the current costs of production, is a note issued or drawn for a commercial or industrial purpose within the meaning of section 13 of the Federal reserve act and is eligible for rediscount by a Federal reserve bank, provided that it otherwise conforms to the provisions of law and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board issued in pursuance thereof. The Federal Reserve Board believes that in determining the eligibility of such a note it is immaterial whether or not it is accompanied by a certificate of the Director General of Railroads of the kind heretofore described.

"'In this connection, however, the board desires to point out the fact that under the terms of section 13 of the Federal reserve act a member bank is authorized to accept a draft or bill of exchange which grows out of a transaction involving the domestic shipment of goods, provided that shipping documents conveying or securing title are attached at the time of acceptance. Such a draft when accepted is eligible for rediscount by a Federal reserve bank at the established rate accorded to bankers' acceptances. In view of the fact, however, that the certificate which your letter states that the Director General of Railroads purposes to issue does not purport to be and is not a bill of lading conveying title to coal shipped, it can not be made the basis of a bankers' acceptance, but, as previously stated, a note drawn under the circumstances described, whether or not accompanied by a certificate of the Director General of Railroads, is technically eligible for rediscount if its proceeds have been or are to be used for the payment of the current costs of production of coal and if it otherwise conforms to the provisions of law and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board.

"'Very truly, yours,

"'(Signed) W. P. G. HARDING,
"'Governor.'"

"The certificate which under the foregoing arrangement will be delivered by the local railroad agent to the shipper delivering the coal to the railroad will be in the following form:

"This is to certify that ——— ——— has loaded into cars No. ——— on ——— Railroad, United States Railroad Administration, ——— tons of coal, and said coal is in possession of said railroad as a carrier to be transported and/or delivered and/or diverted by the Director General of Railroads or his representatives, subject to and in accordance with the order of the United States Fuel Administrator, dated October 31, 1919, and to be paid for by the consignee or divertee to the above-named shipper, as provided for in the said order of the United States Fuel Administrator and in his order of November 12, 1919.

"———, Agent.
"Railroad, United States Railroad Administration.

"I hereby certify that no railroad bill of lading or other negotiable receipt has been issued to me by the railroad in respect of the above-described coal.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DIAL. I present a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Chester, S. C., in reference to shipping. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas the Chester Chamber of Commerce has been advised that there is a movement on foot having for its object the disposition and sale of ships owned by the Government of the United States through the United States Shipping Board, and that a bill has been introduced into Congress to that end; and

Whereas this would seriously interfere with the trade routes recently established from South Atlantic and Gulf ports, with the aid of United States Shipping Board, to the West Indies, Central and South America, and to European and other foreign ports; and

Whereas it is essential to the merchants, manufacturers, and farmers of the Middle West to have free access to foreign markets through the ports of the Gulf and South Atlantic States on the same terms as through North Atlantic ports, and export rates have been put into effect by the United States Railroad Administration, effective December 1, 1919, in the establishment of the new trade routes: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the board of directors of the Chester Chamber of Commerce that the United States Government, for the present, make no disposition of the ships owned by it or operated by Shipping Board that would in any way militate against these trade routes or prevent their further development and maintenance, and we call upon our Senators and Congressmen to oppose any legislation to look into the sale of any of these ships operated on these trade routes until same has been fully established and developed.

President Chester Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER. I present resolutions adopted by the National Farmers' Union in annual convention assembled in Memphis, Tenn., November 20, 1919, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National Farmers' Union in annual convention assembled in Memphis, Tenn., on November 20, 1919, hereby adopts these resolutions and recommendations:

First. We indorse the Kenyon-Anderson bill, which embodies important recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission designed to correct the abuses and extortions that exist in the meat-packing industry and urge its immediate enactment by Congress.

Second. We indorse the Capper-Hersman bill to give the farmers of the Republic the privilege of organizing and conducting collective bargaining associations, based on cooperative principles, but we ask that proper safeguards be included in such legislation to prevent corporations from taking advantage of its provisions.

Third. We favor an amendment to the Federal loan act that will enable a man without a farm but possessing an established reputation for honesty, frugality, and industry to secure loans from the Federal land bank up to 75 per cent of the appraised value of the land. We also ask that the maximum rate of annual payment, including amortization, shall not exceed 5 per cent.

Fourth. We insist that the Secretary of Agriculture should be a practical working farmer, and that the indorsement of farm organizations should receive due consideration in the selection of men for that office.

Fifth. That the highest rates of taxes levied during the war on incomes, corporations, and excess profits be continued until the full cost of the war has been paid, and that the Government also levy a tax on the value of land and other natural resources held for speculative purposes.

Sixth. We urge the adoption of a farseeing, patriotic policy for the reclamation of the waste lands of all sections of the country for the purpose of enlarging the area of agricultural productions.

Seventh. We demand the most vigorous enforcement of all Federal laws to prevent the immigration of undesirable aliens, and we also urge the prompt deportation of all aliens seeking to overthrow our Government and destroy our free institutions.

Eighth. We believe that the principle of cooperation should be applied to the solution of our marketing and industrial problems, to the advantage of the producing, consuming, and laboring classes.

Ninth. We are opposed to the maintenance of war-time armaments in time of peace and to any system of military organization that includes universal military training.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of the Business Men's Club of Chanute, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the marking of cost prices on articles of merchandise offered for sale, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McLEAN. I present a petition from the officers of Yale University in favor of the ratification of the treaty of peace with interpretative reservations. The petition is very short, only nine lines, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does the Senator ask to have the petition read?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a petition from Yale University?

Mr. McLEAN. From the officers of Yale University, in favor of the ratification of the treaty of peace with reservations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit it to be read at this time? It is very brief, is it not?

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection. It is only nine lines.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

We, the undersigned, officers of Yale University, are convinced of the supreme importance of the ratification by the Senate as soon as possible after the beginning of the next session of the treaty of peace with such interpretative reservations as may be proper and necessary, and we urge the Senators from Connecticut to promote such action. We believe that a majority of the most intelligent and public-spirited citizens of all parties in the State will support them in favoring a resolution ratifying the treaty of peace with the league of nations covenant in terms that will readily permit the other signatories to acquiesce in the conditions stated by the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Right in connection with that I should like to present and have read a resolution, of which a copy has been sent to me, which has been signed by 1,757 members of Harvard University, copies of whose names are on my desk. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the peace treaty, including the covenant for a league of nations, should be resubmitted to the Senate, and that the administration and the United States Senators should promptly agree to its ratification with reservations in such form as will enable the other signatories to acquiesce.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present that so that the expressions from these two universities may appear together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COST OF STRIKES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received from the Shipping Board a statement, dated the 6th day of December, entitled "Statement on the cost of strikes." I ask unanimous consent for permission to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

"STATEMENT ON THE COST OF STRIKES.

"UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
"Washington, December 6.

"The serious economic waste involved in marine and shipyard strikes during the period of reconstruction has recently been investigated by the United States Shipping Board.

"Since the 1st of January it is estimated that strikes have cost the Shipping Board a total of $37,000,000. There are included marine and harbor strikes, longshore strikes, and shipyard strikes. These have occurred on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, but the results of the coal strike are not included.

"There are not included losses by foreign or privately operated American vessels, nor indirect losses to the public due to interruption of regular movement of shipping. Among such indirect losses are those due to congestion in port, and on inland transportation systems, spoilage of perishable cargo, and delays of food supplies needed in this country and abroad.

"The marine strikes include that on New York Harbor craft, tying up some 600 boats with approximately 16,000 men out for 13 days. A further marine strike occurred in July with a general tie-up of shipping on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. Some 25,000 men were out for about three weeks.

"A longshore strike in New York during October involved 40,000 to 50,000 men for about 30 days. A further longshore strike occurred at New Orleans in the same month, lasting 31 days.

"Among the 200 strikes in the shipyards one of the largest was that in the Northern Pacific district beginning in January, lasting for 50 days and involving some 40,000 men. A further strike occurred in the San Francisco Bay and southern district in October, lasted 30 days, and involved 35,000 men. A strike in the shipyards in the New York district began in October, lasted about 30 days, and involved some 20,000 men."

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in receipt of an article from the pen of former Senator Shafroth of my State on the high cost of living. I ask unanimous consent for permission to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING, ITS CAUSE AND REMEDY.

"The principal cause of the high cost of living is the fact that nearly all the European nations have been compelled to abandon redemption of their credit money in gold, and to issue in lieu thereof irredeemable paper currencies, thereby decreasing the demand for and the purchasing power of gold, and hence increasing the price of everything that gold will buy.

"It is a fundamental principle of political economy that the price of commodities—the demand remaining the same—varies in the inverse ratio of their production—that is, if the production is great the price is proportionately low, and if the production is small the price is correspondingly high.

The price of commodities also varies with the demand therefor, other things remaining the same; the price increasing if the demand is great and decreasing if the demand is small. All recognize these principles when applied to a single commodity. They are also applicable to gold, but as gold is the standard by which all commodities are measured, its increase or decrease in value can not be expressed in its own units, but only in the increased or decreased quantity of things the units will buy, which is manifested in a fall or rise in prices. Therefore, when all prices rise it means that there is an increase in the supply of, or decrease in the demand for, that which measures the price of all things, namely, money.

"Nearly all the European countries before the war were upon the gold standard, making demands upon gold as redemption money. During the war they each issued large quantities of irredeemable paper currency.

"According to the Gresham law, two legal-tender moneys of different value can not circulate in the same country. The cheaper will always drive out the dearer money. If a man has the option of paying his debts in legal-tender money of less value, he will always avail himself of that privilege, and hence the cheaper money becomes the sole circulating medium of that country. In accordance with that principle, gold, either in the form of coins or of paper money redeemable in gold, has gone out of circulation in nearly all the nations of Europe. This has decreased the demand for gold, decreased its purchasing power, and consequently increased the price of everything that gold buys.

"Before the war the commercial transactions of the European nations that were upon a currency redeemable in gold amounted to fully one-half of those of the world. The use of gold in monetary systems has been far greater than for all other purposes. These nations now make demand for gold only for the arts and to settle international trade balances. This change in demand has made gold cheap. The production of gold is so small, compared to the world's stock of that metal, as to be inconsiderable in its effect. It is stated that gold is worth $20.67 per ounce the world around, but that is only when measured in a currency redeemable in gold. As the value of all staple commodities is determined by world markets, the high cost of living becomes a world problem to be determined not only by the world's supply and demand of each commodity, but also by the world's demand for the one thing which measures all commodities.

"While profiteering affects, to some extent, the price of some commodities, and prosecutions may curtail the practice, and such prosecutions should be pursued with vigor, yet the result will be small compared to the remedy of increasing the demand for gold.

"Nine-tenths of the nations of the world, when the war began, were upon the gold standard, and hence silver was practically a commodity. The increase in the price of silver was due largely to the fact that the allied nations during the war purchased enormous supplies in China, Japan, and India, which had to be paid for in silver. This created a great demand for that metal, which was further increased by the decrease in the demand for that thing which measures silver as well as all other commodities, namely, gold. It is a mistake to assume that world prices of staple commodities can be materially reduced by legislation of one nation alone.

"In my judgment, there should be an earnest effort made to obtain an international agreement to retire all irredeemable paper currencies and to establish throughout the world circulating mediums based upon gold and silver, and, if possible, provide for coins of the same weight and fineness. The retirement could be made by each nation permitting the payment of taxes, partly in its irredeemable currency, which could then be canceled, and partly in gold, which would increase the demand for that metal. Let the financial strength or weakness of a nation be reflected in its bonds but never in its currency. Then will there be freedom from violent fluctuations in world prices.

"JOHN F. SHAFROTH."

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I present a letter—a most thoughtful letter—from Mr. Pitt Henslee, a very successful banker of Dickson, Tenn., in reference to the coal strike and profiteering generally. The suggestions of Mr. Henslee I deem of great importance, and I ask unanimous consent that his letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
Dickson, Tenn., December 5, 1919.

Senator K. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: As you doubtless remember, I was your supporter and political friend, and being this I trust you will pardon me for writing you a few lines as to my judgment of conditions in this section of Tennessee.

There is more dissatisfaction and complaint than I ever knew before, and it appears to me that these conditions are brought about more on account of the greed and selfishness of the profiteers than anything else. I have been in the banking business for nearly 20 years. I am not a member of any labor organization and my health does not permit me to be a laborer in any line, but it appears to me, and it seems to be the unanimous opinion in this section, that the owners of coal mines are to blame for the present condition of scarcity of fuel. As I am informed, coal miners receive from 80 cents to 85 cents per ton for mining coal, and the mine owners sell this coal now at the mines, and have been for the last year or two, at from $2.75 to $3.50 per ton. This undoubtedly is too much profit and the public is suffering. A banker friend of mine, who lives in east Tennessee, writes me that a few years ago coal operators were satisfied to get from 25 cents to 50 cents per ton at the mines for their coal above the price paid miners.

Last summer hogs declined from 23 cents to 12½ cents, and yet the consumers of meat and lard did not buy this necessity any cheaper. Farmers in Dickson County this week sold beef cattle at 6 cents per pound, which they had raised and cared for two or three years, and yet butchers are selling this meat at a profit greater than the price received by the farmer for his cattle.

I have heard in the last few months more farmers say that they were going to vote the Republican ticket next time than I ever heard talk this before. They do not know that Congress is to blame for conditions, but think a Republican could not make it any worse. I have always been a Democrat and voted the Democratic ticket, and while I am interested in the success of the Democratic Party, yet I do not fear so much the defeat of the party as I do the spirit of socialism and Bolshevism that is growing with the people. We may not have a bloody revolution, but it seems to me that we are sure to have a political revolution unless conditions are relieved.

As your political friend, as a Democrat, and as a loyal American citizen, can not Congress do something to regulate and control the profiteers—by the profiteers I mean those who are nonproducers and who are getting rich by great profits derived from the products of the farm and labor.

Trusting you will consider this letter in the same spirit in which it is written, and hoping this will find you enjoying the best of good health, with most cordial good wishes, I am,

Very respectfully,

PITT HENSLEE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I also present for printing in the RECORD a well-considered communication from Mr. H. Waters, of Troy, Tenn. These letters are from men of influence and standing in my State, and show a state of mind that is becoming general. Tennesseeans are almost entirely native born. They are intensely American and are bitterly opposed to the isms so prevalent in certain parts of our country just now.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TROY LUMBER CO.,
Troy, Tenn., December 4, 1919.

Senator McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Belonging to the class of American people known as the middle class, I am, in common with probably 75,000,000 to 80,000,000 others, rapidly losing confidence in the ability or energy of the officials representing the people in Washington.

Food prices show a constantly rising level to the consumer, and the handwriting is on the wall for a condition bordering, if not the real thing, revolution of the sort they are having in foreign countries. The labor agitation in almost every branch where workers are unionized, even though they are receiving the highest wages ever known, shows plainly there is organized—and well organized at that—agitation afoot to place the unions in control of the laws and Government. Of the main happenings, the energetic action of Gov. Coolidge, of Massachusetts, proved successful, and is the only one showing successful handling. The steel strike fell through because the mill owners let the men break themselves. The coal strike affects nearly everyone, the poor more than the rich, and causes untold suffering. Why does the Government dillydally with these conspirators and allow them to run things as they will, at the expense of the great bulk of the people? Their union is certainly admirably organized when the strike will run itself successfully and in spite of the United States court mandates. Men certainly have a right to unionize if they want to. The queer part of it is that when they quit their jobs both the Government and the mine owners accept the situation and make no effort to work the mines. There is one way to handle matters of this sort besides holding hot-air conferences and trying to adjust matters by word of mouth, which simply brings on more talk and gets no coal.

When the miners walked out they quit their jobs. As a simple business proposition the operators should have given them notice to come and get their pay and vacate the company property, houses, etc.; then went on the market and recruited more men to take their places, and if the men who had left their jobs threatened trouble the military should have been called to protect the property and the workers.

Mining is healthy work, under fair conditions, but raising wages isn't going to cure the trouble, as the more they get the more they will demand—ditto with the operators—therefore, fair prices should be paid so that a man can make a decent living by his year's work, and the operators should be restricted to a reasonable profit, not over 12½ per cent on their investment in the gross. All work, so far as possible, should be done by piecework rates, and you would readily find the men who are howling for a 30-hour week would be glad to work 60 hours and not complain.

The railroad brotherhoods, already very highly paid and earning more than they are justified in getting, are pretending to hold sessions, while all the time they are watching for a favorable time to threaten to tie up the country if the Government don't give them exactly what they demand. I have even heard threats as to what they will do if they don't get what they want, and the funny part of it is by the very class of men who are most neglected in the various pay increases because they have no union—the section men.

We have heard here that railroad trainmen are delaying train movements so that coal now mined and loaded does not move, notably on the Tennessee Central.

It is equally true that operators or plant owners should not be allowed undue profits at the expense of the public, but in the course of a good many years experience handling large crews of men I should say it is disgraceful, because one man or the whole crew quit or struck, as the word may be, to let my plant lie idle. If they weren't satisfied with their wages or treatment they have a perfect right to quit their jobs; the plant owner also has a perfect right to get out and hire men to take their places as a common-sense proposition; and this is what the coal-mine operators should be doing, and the railroad men the same when they strike, which they certainly are all set for and expecting every day.

Energetic and intelligent action should be ready to meet the situation in the interests of the people.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. WATERS, Troy, Tenn.

P. S.—We have just read of an instance where the trainmen refused to switch passenger cars containing troops for the protection of the nonunion miners, taking the stand they wouldn't help the "scabs." If this is correct, it is time drastic action should be taken by the Government with United States troops to prevent noninterference, and also to punish under the severest law the responsible party or parties.

SCHOOL OF AMERICANISM.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. Martin J. Wade, judge of the Federal court for the southern district of Iowa, delivered before the Rotary Club of Council Bluffs, Iowa, on the subject of "Americanism." It is the best address on this subject which I have seen. I also ask that the address be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

SHALL WE HAVE A SCHOOL OF AMERICANISM? (S. Doc. No. 167.)

"I am an optimist, and in what I shall say to-night there is no expression of pessimism. I have absolute faith in the American people. I know that, with a few exceptions, they are right at heart, and when aroused by the presence of danger they have a power for organization and achievement not equaled by any other people in the world.

"I am not a pessimist. I am only calling upon the American people to awake from their dream of security and to face a real danger which threatens our most sacred rights and the rights of our children in the years to come. Not only are the rights of America endangered, but civilization itself is threatened.

"We boast—and we have a right to boast—of the marvelous achievements of modern civilization. What is the most wonderful thing that civilization has brought to the human race? Is it our music, our literature, our sculpture, our architecture? No. Is it our accomplishments in science and inventions? No. The most wonderful, the most marvelous, thing which civilization has brought to the human race is a method and a tribunal for settling the differences between men in an orderly and a peaceful way. Men are so constituted that they will disagree. Perhaps the foundation of this human trait is selfishness; perhaps it is pride; perhaps it is the love—nay, the demand—for justice which exists in every human heart. In the olden days the differences between men were settled by brute force. Stung by wrong, or by fancied wrong, at the hands of a neighbor, the passion for revenge was aroused, and for centuries it was the recognized right of every man to wreak personal vengeance. This made the strong man the master. This was true not only of individuals but also of nations. War has been the only instrument known to settle international differences—war and blood and destruction and death. We have not yet an established tribunal to settle international disputes, but the great heart of humanity is filled with the hope that out of our recent World War will come the solution—that an international court will be established which will forever end the inhuman monster which has deluged the soil of the world with the blood of the fair and the brave and the true.

"But with reference to disputes between individuals, after centuries of crude efforts, the human race has found a way to protect right and to restrain and punish wrong; and this tribunal, now provided in all civilized nations of the world, is called a court. To define and direct and restrain human action, to provide for the punishment of wrongdoers, we have rules of conduct called laws. In this country these laws are enacted by the people. So that now, instead of grasping in angry passion the battle-ax or the bludgeon of our ancestors, we turn to the law and to the courts for punishment of those who do us wrong, and let us remember that the law and the courts are the only things that stand between us and barbarism. When men ignore the courts and defy the law in an attempt to impose punishment for wrongdoing they become savages. Mob rule is the rule of savage brutes, who, for the time being, have turned back the hands upon the great clock of time, who have torn down the only barriers which protect the weak against the strong, who have in angry passion swept away the greatest achievement of civilization. Confidence in the law and in the courts is the demand of this troubled hour, and the duty of every man and woman to aid in the maintenance of law and order in times of peace is just as sacred as was the duty to uphold the power and the dignity of the Nation in the dark days of war's awful conflict.

"Am I unduly alarmed? Look around you! Why, the smoke seems to yet hang like a pall over the city of Omaha—the smoke arising from the burning temple of justice fired by the bloody hands of an infuriated mob. The diabolical roar of maddened men crying for vengence still rings in our ears. We can still hear the crash of destruction, the roar of guns, the curses, the shouts of defiance, the moans of terror. We can see the flashing, bloodshot eyes and the foam-flecked lips that cry out for human blood—the blood not only of a man charged with a brutal crime, but crying out for the blood of the chief executive of the city, a man selected by the people themselves but a short time before to preside over the destiny of the city and the homes and the lives of the people of the city; to administer the law; to maintain peace and order; to protect the liberties of the people, rich and poor, high and low. We have before our minds the picture of brutal men turned to jungle beasts dragging the brave mayor of the city to the lamp post, of the struggle of the police to save his life, of his final rescue when life was almost extinct. We see the final triumph of the mob; see the murder of the victim which they sought; we can smell the burning flesh, incense offered to the fiends of hell. Omaha is not alone in her shame. Chicago, Washington, and other cities of this free land bear the brand.

"Am I unduly alarmed? Samuel Gompers, the great leader of organized labor, a few months ago made this statement:

"'America has come out of the war renowned. It is more than a country; more than a continent; more than a name to call upon for freedom and justice to men. It is an ideal; the apotheosis of all that is right. * * * We realize fully that here in the United States we have not yet reached the acme of perfection, industrially, politically, judicially, or socially. But that is not a reason why we should be lacking in appreciation of that which has been accomplished. Regardless of what a man's philosophy may be, surely no reasonable man or woman now believes that we can get on very long or very successfully without some law and some authority vested somewhere. * * *

"'Democracy must be entrenched in the true freedom of the people, maintained by justice, law, and order.'

"This is a comprehensive statement of a great fundamental truth which underlies all human government. In this land authority rests with the people. They express their authority in constitutions and laws of the Nation and of the States, all of which can be changed or repealed by the people at their will. Under the Constitution and the law, courts are provided by the people, and judges are selected by the people to exercise the authority of the people as expressed in the laws which the people provide as rules of community life. And in face of the fact that authority must rest somewhere, and that in this country it rests with the people, and that the people have furnished laws and courts to exercise and enforce their authority, we behold the tragic spectacle of defiance of law—contempt for law and scorn for the courts, felt and openly expressed—by a large number of our people, not foreigners alone but those of American birth and blood.

"Am I putting it too strong? Why, the national convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at Atlantic City in June, 1919, adopted resolutions which contain this language:

"'The power of our courts to declare legislation enacted unconstitutional and void is a most flagrant usurpation of power and authority, and is a repudiation and denial of the principle of self-government recognized now as a world doctrine. The continued exercise of this unwarranted power is a blasphemy on the rights and claims of free men of America.

"'This usurpation of power by our courts to subordinate the legislative and executive departments to their will, and compel the activities of a free people to their whims and dictates, is paralleled and equaled only by the further usurpation of authority of our courts to legislate and punish people in direct defiance of constitutional safeguards to personal liberty and freedom of action.

"'By the issuance of injunctive decrees by our courts, by the restraint they place upon the normal and rightful activities of a free people, by the punishing of free men in the exercise of their constitutional rights without opportunity of a trial by jury, by the removal of the safeguards thrown around the individual against extreme and excessive punishment, and the denial of an opportunity of Executive clemency our courts have vested themselves with a power greater than any despot ever heretofore possessed.

"'The fate of the sovereignty of the American people again hangs in the balance. It is inconceivable that such an autocratic, despotical, and tyrannical power can long remain in a democracy. One or the other must ultimately give way, and we believe that this convention should declare that as wage earners and citizens of a free and democratic Republic we should stand firmly and conscientiously on our rights as free men, and treat all injunctive decrees that invade our personal liberties as unwarranted in fact, unjustified in law, and illegal as being in violation of our constitutional safeguards and accept whatever conclusions may follow.'

"In the last sentence of their resolutions this body of men said:

"'The public mind and conscience should be fully aroused to the dangers confronting the liberties of our people.'

"The public mind and conscience must be aroused, but the first thing which each and every man, woman, and child in America should do is to get into their hearts and souls these words of Chief Justice Marshall:

"'The very essence of civil liberty consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection. The Government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.'

"This is 'a nation of law.' It will live as 'a nation of law,' or it will go back into chaos. And yet upon the street corners and upon the platform and in the papers and periodicals we find a loud, defiant protest against the eloquent words of the martyred Lincoln, who, on the field of Gettysburg, proclaimed this to be 'a government of the people, by the people, for the people.'

"There is no concealment of the purpose of many to change our form of government—some wanting to substitute one scheme, some another, many advocating the abolishment of all government and the substitution of anarchy. Some plan to make the change through the medium of the ballot; others openly proclaim revolution, riot, and the torch.

"Many whose angry voices are heard are foreigners; many of them are not. Some of them are ignorant; many of them are educated; some of them are teaching our children in institutions of learning.

THE CAUSE.

"What is the cause of present dangerous conditions? Space will only permit suggestions rather than explanation. The war disturbed the lives of many of our people; unsettled their occupations; overturned ordinary economic conditions; produced confusion in arrangements for the future of many men and women. The war aroused many elements of human passion which, under the influence of Christian civilization, had long been dormant. War conditions brought large profits to many who have not hesitated to flaunt their good fortune in the face of those who toil. The passion of selfishness and greed seems to have been aroused to a degree never before existing in this country, and many do not hesitate to extort from their neighbors. The common interest in the lives and fortunes of our fellow men, which must exist in a democracy, seems to have faded away. The lesson that the war taught, that we are all 'our brother's keeper,' seems to be already forgotten.

"But the seed of all this has been sown through many years. The truth is that for 15 or 20 years the propaganda of the socialist, the anarchist, the rebel against society, has been consistently carried on without interruption and almost without protest. Millions of copies of socialist and even anarchistic magazines and papers have been going through the mails for a generation. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that at the present time there is distributed throughout the United States, weekly and monthly, 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 copies of vicious periodicals and newspapers, under various names, representing various organizations. These papers and periodicals are carrying a message of despair and hate, contempt for law, and repudiation of the United States as a 'government by the people.'

"A few days ago I received an announcement of a special edition of the Appeal to Reason, which for years has flourished as a mouthpiece of socialism; and this special edition was to be 2,000,000 copies, 'filling 8,000 mail sacks,' taking 'a train of 14 mail cars, each filled to the top,' to haul. These newspapers and periodicals and other literature carrying the same poison are going into the homes of the workingmen and the farmers of this country; they are going into homes where large families of children are growing up; they are going into homes where they have little of any other kind of reading; and they are molding the mind, forming the temperament, and poisoning the souls of the millions who ponder over them under the lamp at night. These newspapers and magazines extend no ray of hope to the ordinary man; they endeavor to array class against class. They try to make the farmer hate the banker, the banker the farmer, the laborer his employer, and the employer his workmen; and in them all we can not find one single word of pride or affection for the flag of our country.

"These are conditions now existing, and existing for a long time, and, frankly, what have we done about it? What are we now doing about it?

THE REMEDY.

"There is a remedy, and only one remedy. The evil can not be corrected by calling names nor by threatening force. Over the country we have a widespread movement for 'Americanism.' It is fine, though it is only at its beginning and needs steady, consistent work to have it bear fruit. But we must not assume that we can Americanize simply by teaching foreigners the English language. This is an essential, of course, but the truth is that in my whole experience through the war I never had a man or woman before me charged with defying the Government who could not speak the English language; most of them could speak it too fluently.

"What is the essence of accomplishment in this movement against the Government? 'Education' is the answer. They have educated, by the persistency of publication and spoken word, a large number of good people into a state of rebellion against their country, and this education is going on every day, and when we think of the little children whose view of life and whose view of their country is gathered from this sewer of poisonous literature, we must ask ourselves frankly, What of the next generation in this country?

"The evil being accomplished by education, it must be met by education. It is the only remedy. In some way we must get a hearing with these poor people who are being deluded. In some manner there must be carried into these homes where the poisoned sheets go a message of truth and enlightenment. It can not all be done in the schools, though much must be done which never has been done. In my judgment, some man or some body of men in this country must start a movement, township by township and ward by ward, throughout the United States, to ascertain the individuals who are the students to-day of socialism, anarchy, bolshevism, and treason. There must be then sent into the homes of these people without expense, every week or every month, wholesome literature answering in detail every falsehood and every argument presented by the treasonable literature which they are now consuming. This literature in behalf of Americanism must not bear the brand or spirit of malice; nor must it assume an attitude of superiority. It must be sympathetic and generous, honest, free from suspicion of being representative of anything of politics or politicians, classes, or trades, or interests. It must be so wholesome and inviting that the children will read it at the evening table. It must be continuous and insistent, and it must hold out the hand of fellowship and brotherhood. It must light the fires of hope in the heart. It must inspire faith and confidence, driving away despair. It must bring to those souls now wandering in darkness the great truth that this is now and always has been and always will be the land of opportunity for the humble as well as for the exalted. It must give a definite conception of the fact that authority here in this country exists in the people. It must drag law and legal relations out of the realm of mystery and superstition. It must exalt the place and the power of the Constitution as the bulwark, not of the rich, but of the poor—the bulwark of human liberty. We must give to these poor people the whole truth, and 'the truth shall make them free.'

"Success in this direction can come only when our loyal Americans, our men and women who are true to the flag, will themselves become better educated in the great truths of our national life, because only with a full realization of the true relation of the individual to the Government can we be the support and the help of those who may be about us, who may have been less favored in life, in the matter of education and experience. Every American should be a lamp lighting the way of freedom, as well as a stone wall resisting every attack upon the integrity of the Nation.

HOW SHALL WE GET THE NAMES?

"The distribution must be intelligent—definite. Millions of dollars are wasted every year in sending through the mail pamphlets, advertising matter, copies of speeches, and books to people who do not need them, who do not want them, who will not read them.

"How shall a mailing list be procured?

"I must here confess that I have had considerable experience in the distant past in assisting in the management of presidential campaigns. It may be assumed that the men of all parties engaged in managing political campaigns have developed the most effective means for carrying on educational propaganda. It is all very simple. In each voting precinct in city and county is a committeeman selected to assist the State and national organizations in campaign work of all kinds. Early in the campaign the bureau of publicity, or the bureau of organization, will send out to this precinct committeeman a questionnaire, with interrogatories, the answers to which will give, among other things, the names of 'independent voters,' 'voters who sometimes scratch their ticket,' 'first voters,' 'dissatisfied voters,' 'doubtful voters,' 'voters who only occasionally go to the polls'—this latter class assumed not to be strong partisans. The precinct committeeman calls to his aid active party workers, who make a canvass of their own neighborhoods; sometimes the work is divided by school districts.

"When the questionnaires, properly filled out, reach headquarters the names are classified and put in mailing lists. Immediately the publicity, or educational, bureau transmits a suitable personal letter—form letter, of course, though most of the recipients do not know it—this is followed by daily or weekly pamphlets, copies of speeches, statistics, appeals—all educational—in the hope that the voter may by election day become convinced that he should vote 'right.'

"In other words, instead of scattering educational matter broadcast, an effort is made to reach the 10 or 20 per cent in each community who may be free from absolute party ties.

"So in this Americanization campaign some staunch American should be selected in each precinct. A questionnaire should go to him, which, when answered by the committeeman, aided by other loyal men and women, will give the names of those who are 'socialists,' 'suspected of being socialists,' 'I. W. W.'s,' 'subscribers to socialist or other radical papers,' 'radicals not otherwise classified,' 'those who appear to be discontented with industrial conditions,' 'those who are heard criticizing the courts or condemning the law,' 'those not otherwise classified whose absolute loyalty is doubted in the community,' 'all those of foreign birth who need help, not otherwise classified.'

"From these answers a mailing list should be made, and every week or two the mails should carry to them something in the way of education, personal letters, periodicals, magazines, pamphlets—anything and everything which will help to bring to them something of the vision of their country as it really is.

"This community classification will not only supply a mailing list, but the names of those needing help being furnished to the local Americanization committees, they can do much to aid in bringing these lost sheep back into the fold.

NOT ALL WILL BE SAVED.

"I am not oversanguine; I expect opposition; I look for resentment at this 'interference.' I am sure that many will write stern letters demanding that their names be stricken from the list. But even these are not hopeless. When a person writes, he deserves an answer, written in the true spirit of brotherhood, making an appeal for a hearing, giving assurance of no offense, pledging sympathy, and expressing a desire to be helpful. To such an appeal many will listen. But even if no man or woman be brought back to the true faith, we may be able to save their children, or some of them, who in 30 years will be making the laws of this country. This generation is going to protect the flag; the next generation may substitute the red rag for the Stars and Stripes.

WHO SHALL BEAR THE EXPENSE?

"The expense of this great peaceful movement to save the Nation will be borne—willingly borne—by those who contributed to save the Nation in the dark days of the war. All that is needed is a realization of the danger and of the duty."

REPAYMENT OF ALLIED DEBT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from yesterday's New York World in relation to the debt which the Allies owe to us and the probability of its repayment.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York World, Dec. 7.]

REPAYMENT OF ALLIED DEBT—NOT A CENT OF INTEREST YET PAID ON MORE THAN NINE BILLIONS LENT BY THE UNITED STATES TO THE ALLIES—BY JANUARY 1 THE AGGREGATE, WITH ACCRUED INTEREST, WILL HAVE REACHED $10,505,919,494—IT HAS BEEN DECLARED RECENTLY THAT NOT A DIME OF THE BILLIONS WE HAVE ADVANCED WILL EVER COME BACK TO US DIRECTLY—ALREADY IT HAS BEEN PROPOSED THAT THE DEBT BE CANCELED AND WAR OBLIGATIONS POOLED—MONEY WAS ALL SPENT IN THE UNITED STATES FOR SUPPLIES AND MUNITIONS—GREAT BRITAIN'S ADVANCES TO ALLIES EQUAL OURS.

[By W. P. Beazell.]

"The armistice was signed a year and a month ago, but the war debts of the Allies to the United States are still mounting at a rate of more than $850,000 a day.

"No actual advance to any of them has been made since October 18, when an additional $1,000,000 went to Italy, but interest on the billions which have already been supplied is accruing ceaselessly, is not being paid, and is being added to the total due.

"By the end of the current calendar year this item of interest alone will have reached $858,500,000. The $9,647,419,494 which represents the credits actually extended by this country to its partners in the conflict against the Central Powers will then stand on the books at $10,505,919,494 really due.

"Just now in Paris financial agents of the Entente powers are seeking a basis of agreement regarding these debts. Ostensibly they are trying to find a way in which they may be changed from their present temporary status into something permanent. In reality, as many believe who have had opportunities for knowing what is really in the minds of the officials, they are feeling their way toward some device for the wiping out of the debts in their entirety.

"One man, whose relation to interallied affairs was of the most intimate character, said this to the World not long ago:

"'Our credits to Europe may as well be regarded as outright contributions to the cause of democracy. Not a dime of the billions we have advanced will ever come back to us directly. By the time these debts fall due, if not long before, a proposal will be forthcoming that they be formally forgiven as representing only a fair apportionment to America of the burdens of the war before she came in, and that we will be getting off cheap, at that.'

PROPOSAL THAT ALL THE WAR DEBTS BE POOLED AS A SINGLE OBLIGATION.

"As a matter of fact, this proposal has already been made. It was put forward in France during the peace conference, although not in the course of the deliberations at Versailles, and it was dropped then only because it was regarded as having been brought up prematurely.

"Within the past fortnight, furthermore, there has been a renewal of the suggestion that all the war costs of the Allies should be pooled and funded as a single obligation. As financial conditions now stand, this may be considered as merely another way of proposing that the United States should underwrite the whole huge sum.

"The negotiations now under way in Paris are for the deferment of interest payments as a first step toward formalizing the loans. Rates of exchange are so high that even if payments were made they would greatly increase the burdens of the debtor nations, and it has been proposed that no payments be attempted even for three years. Beginning in 1923, the proposal adds, an agreed-on share of the previously due interest should be added to that belonging to the current year until all had been accounted for.

"This arrangement would mean that 'when and if' the Allies began to pay interest there would be arrears of $1,800,000,000 to be taken care of. Interest is now running at the rate of $312,000,000 a year, which would amount, for the three years, to $936,000,000 and would have to be added to the $858,500,000 which will be due at the end of this month.

BRITAIN'S ADVANCES EQUAL OURS.

"One other very important factor in the pending negotiations involves the advances that Great Britain has made to the Allies. These amount to almost exactly as much as the advances made by the United States, and the one point of agreement reached so far is that there must be harmony between the dates of maturity fixed by England and America. Otherwise there will not only be confusion but exactions that the other nations can hot meet.

"Small progress has been made with the negotiations at Paris. An infinite number of details have arisen for consideration, each of the debtor nations having its own peculiar circumstances to put forward for consideration, and among New York financiers there is an expectation that the present discussion may not progress much beyond the reaching of some understanding with regard to the payment of interest. It is possible that not even this will be determined at this time.

"It ought, however, to be borne clearly in mind that when these credits were established for the Allies there was no thought that they might not be paid. The question was squarely raised in a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and then Albert Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of foreign loans, who is the agent of the United States in the negotiations now under way in Paris, made this declaration:

"'All the statements made by representatives of foreign Governments—I have in mind particularly the British—have been to the effect that it would be unthinkable that their Governments should not pay their debts. They say they do not want charity; that they have borrowed the money and intend to pay. There is nobody under heaven who can forgive these debts except the Congress.'

UNDERSTANDINGS BUT NO AGREEMENTS.

"Nevertheless, it is nearly three years since the first of these credits was established, and they still remain merely as demand obligations of the nations to whom they were extended. There are understandings but no agreements as to when they shall be paid and what interest they shall bear in the meantime. They have never been put into the guise of permanent and formal obligations, and while the good faith of the Governments has been pledged the debts are, just the same, nothing but matters of bookkeeping record.

"In the meantime the United States is in the position of paying the interest on these debts, which are owed to itself. The money for these credits came from the various Liberty loans, each act authorizing a loan authorizing the Treasury Department to advance to our Allies a certain proportion of the money raised by that loan. Interest on the Liberty bonds is, of course, being paid, and will be, although no interest is coming in from those to whom the bulk of the money was turned over.

"It should also be borne in mind that while this money was loaned to our Allies it was all spent in this country. Great Britain needed munitions; they were bought here and paid for with the credit established for them. France needed horses; they were bought here and paid for in the same way. Italy needed coal; the same process was followed. The actual result of all this was that while a short cut—very desirable in time of war—was taken the supplies that were bought here were paid for by the United States, and that it remains for the future to disclose whether the United States will ever be repaid.

SLIDING SCALE OF INTEREST RATES.

"The first credit to the Allies was established in April, 1917, immediately after we entered the war. It was provided that interest on this should be paid at the rate of 3 per cent. Almost at once the rate was raised to 3½, and when it became necessary to make the bonds of the first Liberty loan bear interest at 3½ per cent the rate to the Allies was raised to that figure. At this rate advances of $400,000,000 were made.

"Then it became apparent that the rate to the Allies would have to be higher, since the bonds would have to have a greater yield. Under the terms of the act authorizing the second Liberty loan it was provided that $4,000,000,000 might be loaned abroad, and the rate for that was fixed at 4¼ per cent. In April, 1918, the rate was again increased, this time to 5 per cent, and at this $5,000,000,000, in round numbers, was loaned.

"But even though each loan was made at a fixed rate of interest, none has ever been paid. At intervals the Treasury Department would make an interest call, but this amounted to nothing more than a computation of what was due. The amount was merely added to the sum of the principal. The last call of this kind was made last May, and it was expected that another will be made the first of the year. The same procedure as before will be followed.

"Tentative times of maturity of the loans have also been fixed, approximating the time at which the Liberty loans must be paid off. The money advanced under the first loan is due June 15, 1947. That advanced under the succeeding loans is due in 1938. Nothing has ever been done, however, as to details of payment.

OUR VARIOUS DEBTORS.

"The desire to reach a harmonious understanding with Great Britain especially has been influenced to some extent by the fact that Great Britain is our largest debtor under these credits.

"The list of them all is as follows:

Great Britain	$4,316,000,000
France	3,047,974,777
Italy	1,620,992,872
Belgium	343,445,000
Russia	187,729,750
Czechoslovakia	55,330,000
Greece	48,236,629
Serbia	26,780,465
Cuba	10,000,000

"Credits of $25,000,000 for Roumania and of $5,000,000 for Liberia never had claims made against them.

"A clearer understanding is being gained of the extremity of Europe as time passes. This extremity obviously has a very direct bearing on her debts to the United States, quite aside from the after-the-war assistance that will have to come from this country. This assistance will amount, it is computed, to at least $9,000,000,000.

DEBTOR NATIONS IN DISTRESS.

"Raphael Georges Levy, testifying recently before the general council of the parliamentary conference on trade, estimated the 'total financial damage suffered by France during the five years of war' at $70,000,000,000, of which $40,000,000,000 was material damage to property and $30,000,000,000 actual war costs. Next year—the first during which any reparation measures will be possible—the budget will amount to at least $5,000,000,000, part of which will be met by taxation and part by borrowing.

"France is preparing to borrow by means of the lottery bond issue scheme, which was voted down last week in the British Parliament. The device is an old and popular one in France, drawing each year retiring bonds at bonuses which represent a substantial reward to the holders. It is expected that the first loan under this plan will be for $10,000,000,000.

"In Italy there seems every probability that a forced loan will yet have to be resorted to. The proposal has been brought up repeatedly, one plan which was worked out in detail providing that possessions up to $4,000 should be exempt, but from that figure up to $10,000 they would be subject to a levy of 5 per cent, rising gradually to 40 per cent in cases of fortunes of $10,000,000 and upward.

"The forced loan has been a nightmare in all the countries of Europe. It has seemed so inevitable in many cases that it is in itself largely responsible for the delay in working out any real plans for rehabilitation."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McCORMICK. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD an article from Harvey's Weekly analyzing the proposed reservations to the peace treaty:

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NULLIFICATION OR AMERICANIZATION.

"Let there be no misunderstanding! The treaty as submitted by the President is no longer an issue. It is dead. It can not be resuscitated. All admit that. The treaty as modified by the Senate is dormant but not dead unless the President so wills. That treaty is the issue. There can be no other.

"What would ratification of that treaty involve—complete nullification or mere Americanization? There the line is drawn, sharp-cut and clearly defined.

"'The resolution in that form,' the President asserts as his opinion, 'does not provide for ratification but, rather, for the nullification of the treaty.'

"'The reservations,' Senator LODGE declares with equal positiveness, 'are designed solely to Americanize the treaty and make it safe for the United States.'

"One or the other must be wrong. Which is right? Let us analyze and consider clause by clause. Take first the preamble:

"'Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations, understandings, and interpretations, which shall be made a part of the instrument of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of said resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit: Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.'

"This is not rejection. It is acceptance. It 'advises and consents' to ratification. The sole condition is that three of the principal allied powers shall signify acquiescence in certain 'reservations, undertakings, and interpretations' to be enumerated. What can be the real objections to that procedure? The first is that it is unnecessary because under custom and precedent silence gives consent. Granted, with respect to ordinary treaties. But this, as Senator BRANDEGEE said, is not an 'ordinary peace treaty.' It is a permanent engagement on the part of the United States to abandon the policy which it has maintained since its formation and to join a coalition of 40 or more nations scattered over Europe, Asia, and Africa.

"Is there anything unreasonable in asking that the only terms under which the United States is willing to do this should be specifically recognized and accepted by three of the other powers concerned? If silence really does give consent equivalent to that of a signed note, why should Great Britain or France or Italy decline or hesitate to grant the written assurance of understanding to which under the circumstances we feel entitled? The way is made easy. No 'opening up of the whole treaty' is called for—only an 'exchange of notes' through ordinary diplomatic channels, which could be made in effect by cable in 48 hours.

"But it is urged that Great Britain would not do this because she could not stoop to bind herself definitely to assent to a certain reservation which incidentally deprives her of exceptional privileges. What can this mean except that she has no intention of recognizing that reservation under the plan of tacit acquiescence?

"It is argued further that Japan would take the same position respecting another reservation which only withholds the approval of the United States of a special territorial concession to her carved ruthlessly out of another faithful ally. Obviously, the query raised with respect to Great Britain here also applies with increased force.

"Other disquieting portents, moreover, are visible—one notably of a most sweeping character. Only last week Col. Robert R. McCormick, one of the proprietors of the Chicago Tribune, cabled to his great journal from London:

"'The London papers widely display the suggestion of the Presse de Paris that if America does not require the acceptance of the reservations in the peace treaty, the Allies will allow the league to be formed and later refuse to recognize the validity of the reservations.'

"'Therefore,' added Col. McCormick, with peculiar urgency, 'it is vital that the Senate does not omit a clause requiring their acceptance. The majority of the league, otherwise, would demand obedience to those sections reserved against under penalty of war.'

"This is what America wishes to avoid beyond peradventure. She is not willing to take the remotest chance that her safeguarding reservations shall be treated as 'scraps of paper.' The pledge to recognize them, we are assured, is embedded with binding force in assenting silence. Then why, asks the United States, Yankee fashion, not 'put it in writing?' We stand ready to sign everything we agreed to. Why should not the others if they are, indeed, sincere? Are they so proud and haughty and superior that they will deign to put only inferences against our bond? Even for policy's sake might they not do well to heed the admonition of our self-designated apologist, Mr. Taft, who pleads with suffocating sycophancy, 'You must be patient with the United States'?

"But though we be considered unduly meticulous in our contention and slightly impolite in our insistence, surely there is nothing in this simple preamble to warrant the President's interpretation.

"It does not nullify. It does ratify. Nobody can deny that.

"'1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the league of nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.'

"This is purely interpretative. Article 1 grants privilege of withdrawal if all international obligations have been fulfilled, but it does not designate the judge of what constitutes fulfillment. The natural impression is that the league itself, like the Senate or House of Representatives, respecting its membership, would possess this power of determination. If so, withdrawal by the United States without indorsement by its eight fellow members of the council of its claim of fulfillment could be accomplished only through repudiation of its obligation and would involve a declaration of war against the league itself. If not, that is to say if the United States should be the judge, as it is according to the President, the reservation only makes plain that which is implied. Again, there is not a vestige of nullification.

"'2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.'

"Upon the fundamentals of this declaration there is no dispute. All admit that under the Constitution the United States can not engage in war 'to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country' or 'employ the military or naval forces for any purpose' except by affirmative action of the Congress. The sole point is one of moral, not legal, obligation, and even here there is little, if any, differentiation. Both President Wilson and Senator BORAH assert that a moral obligation transcends a legal obligation, and that the United States would be in honor bound to recognize and abide by that admitted principle.

"The vital difference lies between the two words 'until' and 'unless'—the Congress 'shall so provide.' The clause proposed by Senator HITCHCOCK as acceptable to the President includes 'until,' thereby retaining and conceding the transcendent moral obligation and making its application solely a matter of time. The Lodge reservation, on the other hand, through the use of 'unless,' holds strictly in Congress its constitutional prerogative to act 'in any particular case' that may arise without being hampered in the slightest degree by any moral obligation arising from commitment of the treaty-making branches of the Government.

"There is yet another phase of this notorious article 10 which should not escape attention. The President, Mr. Taft, and Senator HITCHCOCK have harped persistently upon a single string, namely, that in case of aggression or threat thereof the council has no authority to require this country, except as we have noted in response to a call upon its honor, to use its Army and Navy in enforcing the council's decrees, and, in support of this contention, they plausibly instance the English version of the covenant to the effect that the council shall only 'advise' as to the means by which the United States shall fulfill its obligation.

"But wait a minute! The official French version of article 10 reads as follows:

"'Les Membres de la Société s'engagent à respecter et à maintenir contre toute agression extérieure l'intégrité territoriale et l'indépendance politique présente de tous les Membres de la Société.

"'En cas d'agression, de menace ou de danger d'agression, le Conseil avise aux moyens d'assurer l'exécution de cette obligation.'

"'Avise aux moyens.' What does that mean in plain English? Merely to 'give advice,' as the President and Mr. Taft and Senator HITCHCOCK assert? Not at all. It is a common French idiom and translated accurately reads:

"'In case of aggression, of menace, or of danger of aggression, the council discusses (deliberates upon) and decides upon the means of assuring the execution of this obligation.'

"The French word for 'to advise' is 'conseiller; donner des conseils; recommander.' (Clifton & Grimaux French-English dictionary.) The meaning of 'aviser' (advise) (conseiller, persuader) is obsolete, according to Larousse, Grande Dictionnaire Universal, and antiquated (Spiers & Surenne). The French-German, French-Portuguese, and all-French dictionaries show that 'aviser aux moyens' has only an intransitive meaning, 'think of, reflect on, provide for, look to, supply, etc., the means' to attain an object. It conforms precisely to the Old Testament phrase, appropriated somewhat amusingly at times by the President, himself a doctor of divinity, to 'take counsel together' upon the means, etc., i. e., to decide them—in the Old Testament days after, but in Mr. Wilson's practice generally before, discussion.

"We readily acquit Mr. HITCHCOCK, who was educated in Baden-Baden, and Mr. Taft, who grew up in Cincinnati, of suspicion of anything beyond ignorance of the nuances of a language less familiar to them than German, but the obvious imperfection of Mr. Wilson's command of the French language, acquired during his long sojourn in Paris, is most disconcerting.

"The salient fact, however, is that the Lodge resolution does not declare that the United States will not cooperate in the manner indicated. It simply reserves to Congress the moral as well as the legal right to determine each case upon its merits under the conditions that may at the time exist.

"Clearly there is no nullification here. There is nothing whatever beyond prudent avoidance of the possible necessity of exercising a legal right to offset fulfillment of an obligation confessedly moral in its making but quite likely to prove wholly wrongful in actual performance.

"'3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.'

"This simply makes clear the fact that the Executive, be he Woodrow Wilson or John Smith, can not commit the United States to assumption of control by force of another country without the assent of Congress. It prohibits nothing. It nullifies nothing.

"'4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"'5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the league of nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.'

"Nobody in America—we hasten to except M. Clemenceau's spokesman, M. Lausanne, and other Europeans who take the contrary view—has been more insistent than the President in iterating and reiterating that the Monroe doctrine is, as he admits it should be, fully safeguarded and that American control of all domestic questions is likewise guaranteed by the treaty as submitted. Very good! These reservations simply emphasize and in no sense nullify the understanding to that effect.

"'6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.'

"That is to say, the United States declines to condone the spoliation of our ally China by our ally Japan, sanctioned by the European powers, but it does not set up even that awful crime as a cause of refusal to ratify the treaty. Shocking and shameful as the President himself admits the outrage to be, the reservation does not hold it to afford sufficient reason for nullification. It merely withholds America's approval of the greatest crime ever committed by presumably civilized, professedly honorable, and hypocritically Christian nations.

"'7. The Congress of the United States will provide by law for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the assembly and the council of the league of nations, and may, in its discretion, provide for the participation of the United States in any commission, committee, tribunal, court, council, or conference, or in the selection of any members thereof, and for the appointment of members of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences, or any other representatives under the treaty of peace, or in carrying out its provisions, and until such participation and appointment have been so provided for and the powers and duties of such representatives have been defined by law no person shall represent the United States under either said league of nations or the treaty of peace with Germany or be authorized to perform any act for or on behalf of the United States thereunder, and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

"'8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany or from Germany to the United States only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

"'9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the league of nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency organized under the league of nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.'

"These provisions are purely domestic. They simply constitute the Congress a working partner with powers equal to those of the Executive in transaction of the business. The mere method thus prescribed is, of course, no concern whatever of the other powers.

"'10. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the league of nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

"'11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the league of nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than that violating said article 16, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

"'12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of the citizens of the United States.

"'13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.'

"These are self-protective measures pure and simple. They have no bearing whatever upon the treaty in the sense of nullification.

"'14. The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.'

"This is adroit, we admit with regret, when it ought to be direct. And yet the mere fact that it is obviously a ruse tends to establish the sincerity of the Senate in supporting ratification with effectual reservations. To avoid the delay and disturbance likely to ensue from adoption of textual or technical amendments this method was devised of notifying the world that the United States considers itself the equal of any other nation. The reservation, of course, can affect only Great Britain, and the sole objection that can possibly be raised by that great and friendly Empire would lie in her honest belief that in a supergovernment of the world she is fairly entitled to six votes to one for this recalcitrant but moderately successful colony—a natural and characteristic proposition, but one somewhat difficult to put over on even an unsophisticated people whose forefathers had the audacity to object to taxation without representation.

"The reservation itself, of course, nullifies nothing but the technically numerical and proportionately effective superiority of Great Britain over the United States, and, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Taft to the contrary notwithstanding, we guess that will have to be done.

"Now, there is the whole story. And this is the incontrovertible answer to the query which we propounded at the outset:

"The treaty has not been nullified by the reservations as a whole or in any particular.

"It has been Americanized in part, though by no manner of means in full.

"It ought to be beaten entirely. We hope it will be. But that is beside the mark. All we have in mind at the moment and all we have tried to demonstrate is that the President is wholly wrong in his pronouncement that the reservations spell rejection. They don't. They include ratification. Even Mr. Taft's flatulent concern to 'enforce peace' says:

"'The treaty, even with the reservations now adopted, can accomplish this purpose (peace preservation) and should be ratified. There is no adequate reason why it should not be.'

"We note in conclusion that the President's cautious note to Senator HITCHCOCK did not declare a final judgment. It conveyed no more than a mere 'opinion,' and opinions sometimes change.

"We still think that Mr. Wilson will take what he can get—even the 'irreducible minimum.'

"Remember, he can not run again."

SUGAR SHORTAGE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to call attention to a press dispatch, under date of December 5, from Washington, by the United Press:

UNITED STATES SUGAR EXPORTS NOW AT HIGHEST PEAK—FIGURES MORE THAN DOUBLED IN YEAR IS SHOWN.

[By United Press.]

WASHINGTON, December 5.

The United States now is exporting sugar in larger quantities than ever before, despite the nation-wide shortage, latest Government reports showed to-day.

Reports collected by the Commerce Department explained the situation through October. There is no reason to suppose that exports have dropped since, officials said. Exports in that month totaled 180,197,446 pounds. For October, 1918, exports were 80,105,729 pounds.

Sugar now is being sent out of the country at the rate of more than 50 per cent of the total product, according to reports to the Agricultural Department, which show that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, total production was 2,099,000,000 pounds. Exports for this period totaled 1,119,000,000.

The beet-sugar crop this year will be greater, but there will be a great reduction in cane sugar, according to preliminary reports to the Agricultural Department.

I have a letter addressed to me by a business man in Pittsburgh in which this paragraph appears:

Here we are, exporting practically 100,000,000 pounds more per month than usual, and still there is not one family in ten that has a week's supply of sugar. In fact, Pittsburgh has not had for nearly four months the average of 1 pound of sugar to a family. I know this is true also in other sections, and still the exporting continues to increase. Why? Simply because the speculators can get more for their sugar as an export article than they can under the "sugar-control"—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I do not know whether or not this statement is accurate, but I assume, of course, that it is. It comes from a responsible source. If it is, it is certainly entitled to some consideration at the hands of those who have control of this situation. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is doubtless familiar with this subject, and the Senators from Louisiana, both of whom are present, whether or not they are familiar with the facts, and whether or not it is true that we are now, at a time when the people of America are eating sugar made of corn, exporting 50 per cent more sugar than we exported for the same time during this period last year?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I have not the information to confirm the figures referred to in that article, but I do know that sugar has been exported, and I called the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact about the 1st of October. I was assured at that time that the exportation of sugar from this country would cease; but the latest information I have is that it is still being exported from the United States to European countries.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I know that sugar is being exported, because I talked with one of the supercargoes only day before yesterday, and he stated that two vessels are now being loaded at New York for the purpose of being sent to the Mediterranean Sea; but I want to say to the Senator, if he will pardon me, that Congress is largely to blame, because we have refused to adopt such regulatory measures or pass such legislation as was necessary to control the situation.

Mr. BORAH. I am disposed to challenge that proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to answer my colleague in the statement just made by him. I think my colleague is mistaken when he says it is the fault of Congress.

In the hearings it was positively testified that the sugar of Cuba was not to be purchased by the Government of the United States, although the Equalization Board has recommended that to be done, and the Cuban sugar was left to be purchased by the refineries of foreign countries as they saw fit; and the two cargoes of sugar that were loaded last week are made up of sugar that was purchased from Cuba by foreign countries and sent to America to be refined here and shipped from the refineries.

The great mistake was made when the administration refused to purchase the Cuban crop. The law is in force until the 1st day of January next. The Cuban sugar ought to have been purchased, but it was not done.

Mr. GAY and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, the Louisiana Senators will be very glad indeed to give the information.

The Government has been refining sugar on toll. There is about 50,000 tons of sugar belonging to the British Royal Commission which has been purchased in Cuba, and that sugar is being brought to this country and refined on toll and sent to Great Britain or to other points to which the British royal commissioners see fit to ship it. Mr. Zabriskie, the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, made the statement that there was no sugar being exported from this country except that which the British Royal Commission had already purchased and which was being refined in this country on toll, as stated before.

Now, there is a great difference of opinion with regard to the question of whether or not this sugar should have been bought months ago by the Sugar Equalization Board. If the Senator will allow me, I will be glad to read what Prof. F. W. Taussig, who is a member of that board, had to say on that subject:

I regret not to be able to reach the same conclusion as the other members of the Sugar Equalization Board. I believe that no negotiation should be entered into with the Cuban producers, and that the regulation and restriction of sugar prices should cease with the close of the present arrangement, December 31.

It is true that the evidence now available points to a shortage of sugar in 1920 and to a possibility of prices in that year as high as those of 1919, or even higher. But no certain conclusions can be reached about the future. Prices of sugar will be affected not only by the incoming supplies, but by the general political and monetary conditions of the whole world. The general level of prices in the United States and in other countries may be lower than it is now. Consumption may be reduced by changes in general business conditions or by restrictive measures in importing countries. The present recommendation of the board is that the United States (through the board) should repeat a huge commercial venture, in the hope of protecting conumers and of incurring no loss, but with the clear possibility of having to assume a loss. The operation would involve a guaranty by the Government of extremely high profits to the Cuban sugar planters, and also a virtual guaranty of similar profits to our beet-sugar producers as well as to the planters of Louisiana, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. It would necessarily lead to contracts with the sugar refiners which would guarantee good profits to them also. No doubt in the absence of Government regulation all these producers might make profits higher still; but prediction as to the outcome one way or the other can not be made with any confidence. Business of this kind may be undertaken by the Government under stress of war, but should cease now that we are at peace.

Moreover, the regulation of the price of sugar can not in my judgment stand alone. The whole relation of government to industry in time of peace is involved. If the price of sugar is to be specifically controlled, so should that of bread, of meat, of clothing. In the main we must look for a remedy to the natural development of production and to the return of the entire world to normal financial and economical conditions.

That is the statement of Prof. Taussig, a member of the Sugar Equalization Board, and that advice evidently was followed by the President.

Mr. BORAH. Who constitute that entire board?

Mr. GAY. I think the names of the members are in this report. Mr. Zabriskie is the president of the board. Mr. William A. Glasgow, of Philadelphia, is a member of the board. Mr. Herbert Hoover is a member. I do not recall the names of the others.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GAY. The names are published, however, in the hearings which were held recently before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I shall be very glad, indeed, to insert the names if the Senator will permit me:

SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD.

George A. Zabriskie, president; Herbert Hoover, William A. Glasgow, Theodore F. Whitmarsh, Edgar Rickard, Dr. F. W. Taussig, Clarence Wooley, E. Edward Shattuck.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Mr. Glasgow, I think, has given more attention to this subject than Mr. Zabriskie, and I know that both of them have given more attention to it than Dr. Taussig. I know that all of the members of the board, with the exception of Dr. Taussig, were in favor of purchasing the Cuban crop of sugar.

There was a propaganda started—I do not know from what source it originated—with a view of creating in the minds of people the impression that there was going to be not a shortage of sugar for the year 1920 but a surplus; and Dr. Taussig seems to be the only member of the board who took that position. I want to say that the Equalization Board was told not once but many times that the beet-sugar producers of this country were ready and willing to enter into a contract with the Government of the United States that they would not sell sugar above a certain price, and they even went so far as to say that they would allow the board to fix the price, but nothing was done.

I have not any doubt but that there is a shortage of sugar in the world, and anybody else who has followed the question knows that the production of sugar in the world this year of 1919 is not sufficient to meet the needs of the people of the world, and some parts of the world will not be able to secure sugar sufficient for their wants.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think it is too late now to purchase part of the Cuban crop of sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am fearful that it is, because of the fact that the great bulk of it has already been purchased, and the holders of the balance of the sugar realize the great advantage in the position they occupy. We have no power to compel them to sell sugar at any price lower than that at which they desire to sell it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said that the fault was with the administration and was not with Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is aware of the fact that there was a bill introduced, either in the latter part of October or the first part of November, providing that the Government should purchase a part or all the Cuban crop of sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, the bill was not for that purpose. The bill was for the purpose of compelling sugar producers and purchasers to secure licenses before selling sugar.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it was for the purpose of compelling licenses to be issued, and at the same time to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. The board has that right now.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a difference of opinion as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no difference of opinion with the members of the board. Dr. Glasgow does not think there is any difference, and Mr. Zabriskie, the chairman of the board, does not think there is any.

Mr. HARRISON. The Equalization Board came before the Committee on Agriculture, and they said they did not think it would be advantageous to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar unless they were given the authority to regulate the price of sugar in the United States, and the Committee on Agriculture reported out what is known as the McNary bill on November 3. That bill has been on the calendar ever since. We have been unable to get it up and pass it in the Senate. It would seem to me that we ought to pass that bill at the very earliest possible moment. It may be that we can give some relief to the people.

I want to say in this connection that when the Committee on Agriculture was hearing these gentlemen on that proposition they said that if we did not purchase the Cuban crop of sugar and did not have regulation touching the sale of sugar the price of sugar would not go over 11 or 12 cents a pound. That was presented to us not by the Equalization Board but by other people. Sugar has gone in some instances to 27 cents a pound. It is being sold in my State at 27 cents a pound. Some of the producers in Louisiana are charging 18, 19, and 20 cents a pound. It does seem to me that if in order to bring the price of sugar down we have to give authority to regulate the price that is to be fixed to the consumers we ought to do it, and I would go that far, even though I voted in the committee against it.

Mr. GAY. Will the Senator from Idaho yield, that I may ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GAY. I would like to ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] if we should go that far in regard to cotton and other commodities?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think it is necessary to go that far in regard to the price of cotton.

Mr. GAY. I wanted merely to get the Senator's view.

Mr. HARRISON. In this country we are not exporting sugar. We have not a supply of sugar on hand. We do export a great deal of cotton. If we have to purchase sugar from abroad, we ought to get it from abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that if the people of his State are paying 27 cents a pound for sugar, I can not see why action is not taken against the people selling at that price, under existing law, as profiteers. I understand that the Equalization Board have stated that under the conditions existing in Louisiana, and affecting the Louisiana sugar crop, 17 cents would not be a profiteering price for the sugar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to show. The reason given is that the crop is a very limited one, and the expense of manufacturing sugar in Louisiana this year is such as to justify a charge of 17 cents a pound.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator when the United States Government became a guarantor of profits in any business?

Mr. GAY. I can answer that question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask, in another form, the same question which was asked just now by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. Suppose that weather conditions or other difficulties should result in a shortage of the cotton crop. Must Uncle Sam come forward with the Treasury containing money wrung from the taxpayers to make a profit to the cotton raisers or to please the wheat growers or any other producers of the country? If so, then we are certainly launching upon a governmental policy that has no limitations. And if my law practice fails, if I should ever go back to it, I will expect the Government of the United States to supplement my deficiencies with a very appropriate arrangement by which I could get money from the United States Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that if sugar took the same course that cotton is allowed to take, sugar would be selling all over the United States at 20 cents a pound.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be; and even more.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I wish to call attention to the question asked by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. This is a very interesting question to me. I received a letter from a constituent the other day saying that he could not buy any sugar where they had been buying it for 25 or 30 years, in New York, but they were required to go to New Orleans. They have adopted some zone system by which they have to buy it down there instead of buying it in New York. He stated that they could buy it in New York for 9 cents, but had to pay 15 or 20 cents in New Orleans. I referred the matter to the board, and they said we ought to buy it where we could get it and not buy it where we could get it cheapest, and we were forced to buy it in New Orleans instead of New York.

I would like to ask the Senator from Louisiana why that regulation? Where does it come from, and what authority have they to regulate my right to buy in a high market when I could buy in a low market?

Mr. GAY. If the Senator from Idaho will still yield, I will answer that question.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GAY. As the Senator from North Carolina well knows, we are presumably at peace but technically we are still at war. There are some commodities that are still controlled under war-time regulations, and sugar happens to be one, in so far as certain contracts that were made during the war with the Cuban planters and the bringing of sugar into this country are concerned.

The contracts which were made during the war with the beet people and with the sugar producers of Louisiana have expired, and the producers of sugar in the United States feel that sugar should be treated like every other American agricultural product; that it should be regulated according to the law of supply and demand.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I want to correct one statement just made.

Mr. GAY. Will the Senator permit me to finish my statement?

Mr. KING. I think the Senator ought to have his statement corrected. I think he will be glad to do so. I think he is in error in saying that the sugar producers of the United States desire the law of supply and demand to take effect, if he means by that that the sugar producers all desire these high prices. I know that the beet-sugar people of the West were perfectly willing, and are now, to sell sugar at 9 and 10 cents a pound, and they do not want 15, 18, or 20 cents a pound. If the Louisiana sugar producers are charging that, I think it is an outrage.

Mr. GAY. The Senator may think that the people do not want the law of supply and demand to regulate, but on that I think the Senator is in error, for I have heard from some of his friends in the beet section that it is simply a case of trying to have the law of supply and demand go into effect.

In regard to the zone system, let me say that the Food Administration did divide the country into a zone system whereby sugar from the West should supply a certain territory, sugar produced in the South should supply a certain territory, and sugar that is manufactured or refined in the East should supply a certain territory.

That zone system will in all probability come to an end when the Sugar Equalization Board goes out of existence on the 1st of the coming January. It is my opinion that had the Sugar Equalization Board come to an end in August last, people who are in the business of importing into this country would have known the Government's policy, and we would not have had this great scarcity of sugar at this time.

Let us bear in mind that sugar has been the cheapest article of food in the United States. There is a world shortage of sugar. The price has been held down in this country by artificial means and consumption has been greater than ever before. This caused the American consumer to eat a normal year's supply in nine months, which is the admitted cause of the temporary shortage to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator why, when the grocers in my part of the country have been buying their sugar in New York at from 50 to 75 per cent less than they can buy it at New Orleans, they should be compelled to buy it at New Orleans?

Mr. GAY. The sugar producers of Louisiana are not under any contract with the Government to supply sugars below the cost of production. However, they did agree that they would not sell their sugars above 17 cents for yellow sugars for this season. They could only be prosecuted under the law for profiteering, and even at 20 cents they would not be profiteers, for they have a crop failure throughout the State. There is no reason why the people of North Carolina can not buy sugars from New York when the zone system comes to an end, and that will be on the 1st of January, when the Equalization Board ceases to exist.

The reason why the sugar in New York is being sold at the price that it is is that there is a remnant from the contracts made during the war which is still being refined in this country and being distributed in that territory, and North Carolina, unfortunately, is not in that zone.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to say a word, I have taken this subject up not only with the Attorney General but with the United States Equalization Board. It is not correct to say that the department fixed a price for Louisiana sugar, as I am informed, but they attempted to limit the profit which the Louisiana sugar producer should be permitted to get for his crop. It was said that the Louisiana crop was a 50 per cent failure. They have been selling at 17½ and 18 cents. Just within two or three weeks I had a letter from a prominent wholesale grocery firm of Columbus, Ohio, which inclosed a circular letter which had been issued by a sugar broker in which he stated that he had recently bought 18,000 barrels of Louisiana sugar at 17½ or 18 cents, although I am not entirely clear in my own mind at the present time as to the exact figure, and said that they could buy more if orders were placed promptly. At the same time in the beet-sugar district the price had been fixed at 10½ cents per pound. The result was that there was cane sugar from Louisiana, for which the dealer paid 18 cents per pound, or thereabouts, and beet sugar, for which he paid 10½ cents per pound. I know of no way whereby the ordinary consumer can distinguish between beet sugar and cane sugar. It can not be done. Those prices prevailing in a given locality would give a splendid opportunity for every dealer to profiteer when it came to the sale of beet sugar.

In addition to that, at the time when this price was fixed of 10½ cents by the Department of Justice, the United States Equalization Board had told the beet-sugar producers that they would give them 11 cents a pound for all they had on hand the latter part of November. The result of these statements has been that many of the beet-sugar firms have been withholding from the market their beet sugar, and that has led to the scarcity throughout the country.

We have in Ohio, I believe, five beet-sugar plants, and there are some in Michigan. They were supposed to supply that section of the country. I was informed that it was proposed to adopt some sort of a zone system whereby the beet sugar would be confined to one section, the Louisiana sugar to another, and the Cuban sugar to another.

I know that the subject of the hoarding of sugar has been investigated and is being investigated. I am satisfied that there is not such a scarcity of sugar in this country as dealers would make believe.

Further, as to the question of the shipping of sugar abroad, it is true that there was some sugar shipped abroad earlier in the season. My information from the United States Equalization Board was that the sugar which was being shipped was a part of last year's Cuban crop, and that when it was bought by this Government it was with the understanding that a certain portion of it—I think one-third—would be given to our allies.

I have been hoping that this matter would be pressed a little further and that we should buy the Cuban crop, if we could get it, though we have now to compete in the market with our allies to get it, and the probabilities are that we would have to pay more for it, if we could get it at all, than we would have had to pay a short time ago.

That is, in brief, the situation as I have understood it. I know people everywhere are having difficulty in getting sugar, but, in my judgment, there is at least enough sugar in this country so that the people do not have to be in want, as they are now in fact.

Mr. BORAH. If it were not for the speculators.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in explanation about the situation in Louisiana. That State normally makes about 300,000 tons of sugar. This year it is going to make—I hope the Senator will give me his attention—about 100,000 tons. We thought we would make about a 40 per cent crop when we began to harvest, but owing to the continued rains and very warm weather, which prevents the sugar cane from maturing, I am told by Judge MARTIN, who represents the sugar district where practically all the Louisiana sugar is made, that we will not get over a 25 per cent crop.

If it had not been for the understanding which the Louisiana sugar growers had with the Department of Justice, acting through the Federal district attorney in New Orleans, that the Louisiana crop might be sold at 17 cents per pound without fear of prosecution for profiteering, the Louisiana growers could have received a great deal more than 17 cents per pound. They were being offered more than 17 cents and were being begged to sell the sugar at more than 17 cents.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to make my statement, and then I will yield.

The Department of Justice, seeking to do everything possible to straighten out the situation and intending to prosecute all profiteers, had the conferences with representatives of the Louisiana growers, and acting through the Federal district attorney of New Orleans, with several former high officials of the Government aiding him, on the one side, and a number of Louisiana planters on the other, it was decided that if the sugar producer sold at not more than 17 cents per pound he would not be guilty of profiteering, owing to the very, very small production. That is the Louisiana situation.

As to the beet crop, we are informed that the beet producers made more than the normal crop this year; as to the Hawaiian crop, they made more than normal; as to the Porto Rican crop, they made more than normal; as to the Cuban crop, they made more than normal. This country consumes normally in the neighborhood of 4,000,000 tons of sugar per annum. We raise in the United States and our insular possession—Hawaii and Porto Rica—about 2,000,000 tons. Cuba raises normally about 4,000,000 tons, and this year is producing about 4,500,000.

So the United States, outside of her continental and insular possessions, which, as I said, will produce 2,000,000 tons, will have to purchase about 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 tons from Cuba. Unfortunately this year we are consuming so much more sugar than ever before—about 92 pounds per capita for every man, woman, and child in the United States as against 84 pounds heretofore. You can make the calculation yourselves. That means 8 pounds per capita more for 110,000,000 people. It is an immense additional consumption of sugar.

We have in the United States available for use, in round numbers, 2,000,000 tons, and that does not take in anything from the Philippine Islands, which produce about 150,000 tons. We have available the Porto Rican crop and the Hawaiian crop and the beet crop and the Louisiana crop. Then, of course, we have available what we can buy from Cuba. We ought to buy about 2,500,000 tons from Cuba.

What is going to happen to the balance of the Cuban crop? There is a big demand from all over the world for sugar. Germany, as we all know, used to make an immense quantity of it. Her production of sugar has been practically destroyed. Austria used to produce a great deal of sugar, but her production has been practically destroyed by the war. France made plenty of sugar for home use, but her production has been cut down tremendously.

So there is a considerable demand for sugar in Europe, and I rather think there will be more effort and more demand on the part of European nations to buy the surplus of the Cuban crop over and above what we need than there has been heretofore. But I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that there is plenty of sugar. There is no reason why the tremendous apparent sugar shortage should exist. We have always had to go to Cuba for some of our sugar, and there is a large amount there now available.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield now for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. My information from Ohio is that the beet sugar in that section can be sold at 10½ to 11 cents a pound for the refiner and at a very good profit. I want to confirm the statement made by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I have information corroborating what he has said as to the price of sugar in the far West. There is at least for the present a sufficient supply of beet sugar to meet all present demands in Ohio, Michigan, and that section of the country. Assuming that to be so, ought the public that consumes this sugar in Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana be required to pay the refiner either 17½ or 18 cents and give that exorbitant price to the refiners because, perhaps, unfortunately in another section of the country they had a partial failure of the crop and they can not make a profit out of that?

I would like to be just to all sections of the country if it is possible to be just to them, but I have not in mind now, at least, any plan whereby these prices can be fixed so that we can help the Louisiana producers make a large profit and not make an exorbitant profit for the beet-sugar people. Meanwhile the public is suffering for the want of sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. In answering the Senator I would say that he is a little mistaken in assuming that the Louisiana planter is going to make a big profit on sugar at 17 cents a pound. Unfortunately a great many of them are going to lose money and would lose a great deal even if they got 20 or 25 cents a pound. I do not know just what is the solution of the situation.

It seems to me it is one of the troubles we have inherited from the war. I do not think it would be fair to the consuming public of America for the beet-sugar producers to get more than a just and proper price for their product. I believe every producer of an agricultural commodity ought to get a just and proper profit on his enterprise, but I understand, as does the Senator from Ohio, that 10½ cents per pound would give the beet-sugar producers a good profit. I am under the impression that 10½ cents a pound would give the Porto Rican producer of cane sugar and the Hawaiian producer of cane sugar a good profit, and that price would certainly pay very handsomely the Cuban producer of sugar, after deducting the duty and the transportation charge to this country. But that price would not let the Louisiana people out whole.

Just what the remedy is I can not say unless we wish to do violence to all the laws of supply and demand and pass arbitrary provisions permitting the Sugar Equalization Board to buy all the sugar crops in this country, dish them out at a price which would give a fair profit to all concerned, and have the Nation stand the loss on the extra price that would have to be paid to the Louisiana producer in order to save him from loss.

That in substance is what was contemplated by the McNary bill, that the Sugar Equalization Board would purchase all the sugar from our own producers and such amount of the Cuban crop as would be necessary. They would then sell it to the consumers of this country at, I suppose, 10½ to 11 cents per pound. I think there was some talk about selling the small Louisiana crop, which is not one-fortieth this year of what is needed by the American consuming public—it is a very small amount—to the sweet-drink men and the candy people. It was said they would gladly buy all the Louisiana sugar without any losses to the Equalization Board. I think that might have been arranged, but Congress did not see fit to pass the legislation.

The Equalization Board insisted that they could do nothing practical and successful unless given the power of control, the power of license, the power of regulation. Congress is not prepared—and I do not think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is prepared at this moment—to say that we should pass a law giving the power of license, regulation, and control to the Sugar Equalization Board, or to any other governmental agency, to interfere with the laws of supply and demand, to go into my place of business and tell me what I should do with it. These things were done during the war.

Mr. BORAH. If the law of supply and demand is going to be abrogated, I want it abrogated by the Government and not by profiteers.

Mr. RANSDELL. I assure the Senator there is no profiteering in Louisiana.

Mr. BORAH. I am not picking out particular places, because I have not the information to do so, but as I have sat here and listened to the different experts upon the sugar question I have no doubt in the world but what there is profiteering.

Mr. RANSDELL. I rather imagine there is some profiteering, but it is not by the Louisiana producers. I wish to say that I am now simply speaking for the men who produce sugar in Louisiana. They certainly are not profiteering in selling their crop at 17 cents per pound.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber a few moments ago, and I observe that the discussion has been concerning the sugar situation. Some time in October last I proposed three different measures authorizing the Sugar Equalization Board to acquire all sugars of the crop of 1920. I simply desire to notify the Senate that to-morrow, during the morning hour, I propose to ask permission to take up for consideration the so-called sugar bill. The reason I do not do so to-day is because of the fact that there are only 45 minutes left of the morning hour during which that bill might be considered. I desire to say something on the situation as I view it and in reference to the hearings which have been had on the subject before the subcommittee of which I was chairman. I shall ask the privilege to-morrow morning in the morning hour of having the bill taken up for final consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 3109) to amend section 26 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 317) thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1455) for the relief of John L. O'Mara (Rept. No. 319);

A bill (S. 2954) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Albert F. Smith, deceased (Rept. No. 320); and

A bill (S. 3152) for the relief of George W. Mellinger (Rept. No. 321).

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1453) for the relief of Adolph F. Hitchler (Rept. No. 322); and

A bill (S. 1454) for the relief of John F. Kelly (Rept. No. 323).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3176) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Marion C. Raysor an officer of the Army, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 324) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3348) to create a department of air, defining the powers and duties of the director thereof, providing for the organization, disposition, and administration of a United States air force, creating the United States air reserve force, and providing for the development of civil and commercial aviation, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 325) thereon.

CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back unanimously without amendment the bill (H. R. 9822) to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication. I ask that it may have present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized in the name of the Government of the United States to call, in his discretion, an international conference to assemble in Washington, and to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, representatives to participate therein, to consider all international aspects of communication by telegraph, telephone, cable, wireless telephone, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities for international communication on a fair and equitable basis.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State for expenses incidental to the conference, including personal services in the District of Columbia notwithstanding the provisions of any other act: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used in entertainment or for the purchase of medals and badges.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of State, the message from the President of the United States on the subject, and the House report on the bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, December 3, 1919.

The Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You will recall the message which was sent to the Congress by the President on September 10 relating to a proposed international conference for the consideration of all aspects of communication by land, sea, and air. The message was printed as Senate Document 88 and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. At your request a draft bill was later submitted to the Congress, and the House, on October 22, passed it with certain amendments.

I need hardly remind you of the very great importance and the extreme urgency of this matter. Because of the delicacy of the questions involved it is perhaps more difficult to go into them in a letter than it would be to discuss them with you personally or with the members of the Foreign Relations Committee. If there is any information which you desire and which I am able to furnish, I shall be most happy to see you or to appear before the committee for that purpose. If you desire more detailed and technical information than I am able to give, I will arrange to have the officials who have advised the Government on this matter appear before you at any time which may be convenient.

I am, my dear Mr. LODGE,
Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPHIC CONFERENCE.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington, October, 1919, to consider all aspects of telegraphic communication by land, sea, and air.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the extension of the invitation, and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to the powers concerned, to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
September 10, 1919.

The PRESIDENT:

During the course of the discussions in the council of five, regarding the disposition to be made of German cables, the following agreement was reached:

"The principal and allied and associated powers shall as soon as possible arrange for the convoking of an international congress to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis."

I learn that the four principal allies, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, have accepted, in principle, the suggestion to meet in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to them, for the purpose of making a study of the entire communications problem in all its aspects, which would include a consideration of the broader activities of the international telegraph and radiotelegraph unions of the interallied radio commission. I am convinced that the proposed conference offers a rare opportunity not only to provide the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis, but to promote world peace, mutual understanding and fellowship arising from a communications system free from special privileges and placing each part of the world in immediate contact with every other part.

The Executive being prohibited by a provision of the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, from extending an invitation of this nature without specific authority of law, I have the honor to request that, should you approve, this matter be laid before Congress for its decision as to whether it will authorize the extension of the formal invitation and will provide the appropriation of $75,000, which it is thought will be required for United States representation in this international conference.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1919.

[House of Representatives, Report No. 387, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 9822:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9822) to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication, reports it back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The amendment is as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "appoint," insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Your committee, in considering this bill, has heard the testimony of the Secretary of State and of Mr. Walter S. Rogers, who was special adviser to the peace commission at Paris on matters relating to international communication.

The general question of international communication was raised at a meeting of the supreme war council in Paris early in March last, in connection with the German submarine cables which had been taken over by Great Britain and France. The problem of the disposition of these cables was left to a special committee, which later made a report to the council of ten, consisting of the heads of state and ministers of foreign affairs of the five principal powers. In the course of the discussion it was suggested that there should be world arrangements made for the regulation of submarine cables.

It developed that there was no unanimity of opinion on the part of international lawyers and jurists as to the rights of property in submarine cables in times of war. There were two cables connecting Germany with the United States. Both of these cables were from Emden to the Azores and from the Azores to New York. Both were cut in the English Channel, and later one was diverted into Lands End, England, and the end of the cable going into New York was cut and diverted to Halifax. This gave the British an additional cable from Lands End to the Azores and from the Azores to Halifax. The European end of the other cable was diverted into Brest, France. This gave the French an additional cable from Brest to the Azores and from the Azores to New York. A more extreme case was presented by the cable from Liberia to Brazil. Both ends of this cable were in countries at war with Germany, and the cable was the only means of communication between parts of South America and Africa; yet because the cable in question was owned by a German company the Allies cut it and severed all means of communication previously utilized by means of the cable. The United States had seriously objected to the diversion to Canada of the German cable across the Atlantic by the British authorities, but owing to the lack of international law or agreement on the subject no redress was obtained. It may be said parenthetically at this point that Great Britain is the great world owner of submarine cables. France possesses some and the United States possesses some. Germany, until the war, was also the owner of several. Under these circumstances the internationalization of cables will, presumably, be to the advantage of the United States, and the American Government favored this step at Paris. At a later meeting of the council of five, held on April 30 last, during a discussion as to the disposition of the German submarine cables, Mr. Balfour, representing Great Britain, said that his country had no desire to monopolize the cables of the world and that all were in agreement that the multiplication of cables was beneficial to all. The outcome of the discussion was a proposal to negotiate an international convention upon the use of submarine cables and upon the rights of property therein in peace and war.

The arrangement was formulated by the council of five in the following words:

"The principal and allied and associated powers shall as soon as possible arrange for the convoking of an international congress to consider all international aspects for communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned, with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis."

The four principal allies, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, have accepted in principle the suggestion that if an invitation is extended by the United States in the near future for the purpose of making a study of the entire communications problem in all its aspects, that invitation will be accepted by them.

The deficiency act, approved March 4, 1913, provides:

"Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event, without first having specific authority of law to do so."

In order to obtain the necessary sanction, the President of the United States and Secretary Lansing have requested Congress to enact the present bill. Their recommendations are printed as an annex to this report. It was originally planned to hold the conference in question in Washington during the present month. For various reasons—one of which was the fact that the legislative authority was lacking—the conference can not be held as early as thus planned. It is believed, however, that if it is to be held at all, it is desirable that as early a date as possible be fixed. Consequently your committee recommends action upon this measure as promptly as convenient.

Your committee believes that it will be of great importance and advantage to the United States if, through the medium of some such conference as above projected, the question of international communication can be considered and disposed of and an international agreement or convention arrived at.

It will be remembered that the United States was the first to propose the International Postal Union, which has been in most beneficent operation for many years. In the opinion of your committee, the tendering of an invitation to the other powers to inaugurate plans for an international agreement affecting other means of international communication will be equally beneficent not merely to the United States, but to the entire civilized world. Your committee, therefore, recommends that the necessary authority be granted the President, and that an appropriation of $75,000 be made for expenses incidental to the conference. It is not possible at this time to indicate whether or not $75,000 is the requisite amount of money. It is, for example, not possible to forecast the length of the sessions of such a conference. They may continue for one month or three months. Obviously the expenses will depend very largely upon the duration of the meetings.

The Secretary of State, in a letter which is appended to this report, states that the delegates representing the United States at the telegraphic conference will probably receive no compensation, certainly not in any large amount. On the other hand, it will probably be necessary to pay compensation to technical experts and it will be expected that the expenses of delegates and experts should be paid. The number of delegates and experts will depend entirely upon the scope of the conference as it may be agreed upon by the participating Governments or limited by Congress itself. If, for example, its labors be confined to communication by submarine cable, the need of experts would be limited accordingly, but if the subject of radio telegraphy and telephony should be included, the number of technical experts and advisers, as well as of clerks and other employees, would necessarily be greatly increased. Then, too, there is the matter of preparation for the conference after a program shall have been adopted. It is known that at least one great Government has already a commission at work studying the whole subject of communication. As soon as Congress shall have authorized the holding of a conference, it will be necessary for the United States to organize a commission of the best-known experts of the Government to make immediate technical studies and collect and coordinate information for the use of the American delegates when appointed. This preliminary work will be of the utmost importance to the proper protection of American interests at the conference and will require the expenditure of a considerable sum of money for clerical assistants, printing, separate quarters, and compensation of experts.

As a slight guide to the expenses entailed by the holding of this type of conference, there are quoted herewith a summary of the expenses of the Fifteenth International Congress of Hygiene and Demography (held in Washington in 1912), and of the United States section of the International High Commission, 1916–1918:

Your committee thinks further that the holding of this conference is desirable from the standpoint of the United States whether or not the treaty of peace, now pending before the United States Senate, is adopted either as submitted or in a modified form. Your committee, therefore, sees no reason (this question being, in its view, an independent one) for deferring the authority carried in this bill until after final action by the Senate upon the treaty of peace.

For the foregoing reasons your committee recommends early favorable action upon the bill.

So much for the history, occasion, and purposes of the conference.

The majority of the committee understands that the dissent of the minority is based not upon any opposition to the conference itself but solely upon the amendment to the bill stipulating that the representatives to the conference on the part of the United States shall be confirmed by the Senate. The suggestion will perhaps be made that in some way this involves an element of discourtesy to the President. Nothing can be further from the fact, as an examination of the precedents clearly shows.

One of the purposes of the proposed conference, and certainly the most important purpose, will be to draft some form of international treaty or agreement to which the several Governments participating will be invited to adhere. During Secretary Lansing's testimony concerning the conference the following colloquy occurred:

"Mr. TEMPLE. The questions to be taken up at that conference are such as would be put into an international agreement, like treaties?

"Secretary LANSING. Yes, sir."

Mr. Walter S. Rogers testified to much the same effect. (See p. 20 of his testimony.)

It is true that Secretary Lansing subsequently stated in a letter to the acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that "it is not the purpose to have the delegates to the international telegraphic conference negotiate a treaty." Nevertheless it seems from the testimony of Secretary Lansing and others that the conference will fall short of its full measure of usefulness if it does not undertake to draw up, at least in a preliminary way, the basis for an international convention of some kind. And, as above stated, the testimony before the committee indicates that such an agreement, whether formal or informal, may be expected and hoped for as a result of the conference. Hence, whether or not the representatives of the United States are or are not technically commissioners to negotiate a treaty, the fact remains that their wisdom and foresight may go far toward establishing the permanent policy which the United States will maintain toward the other great powers of the world in this most important sphere of international relations. This being so, it is perhaps of secondary consequence whether the representatives of the United States may actually negotiate a treaty. The important fact is to recognize the magnitude and gravity of their problems and to insure, so far as possible, that the ablest and most experienced men available in the United States shall be called upon to represent this country.

But perhaps the gentlemen who deny the propriety of requiring confirmation by the Senate in this connection will point out the undoubted fact that even commissioners explicitly appointed and empowered to negotiate a treaty have not uniformly or even in the majority of cases been confirmed by the Senate. Whatever the method has been in the majority of such appointments in our history, there is a very numerous and respectable number of precedents for the method of appointment recommended in this instance.

In his message to the Senate January 11, 1792, President Washington nominated William Carmichael and William Short as commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Spanish Government for the navigation of the Mississippi River.

In communicating May 31, 1797, to the Senate for confirmation the nomination of C. C. Pinckney, Francis Dana, and John Marshall as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic, President Adams explained, in general terms, that they were appointed to "negotiate with the French Republic to dissipate umbrages, to remove prejudices, to rectify errors, and adjust all differences by a treaty between the two powers." The Senate on June 5 confirmed the nominations, and, on June 22, the substitution of Elbridge Gerry for Francis Dana. When negotiations were reopened in 1799 the Senate was called upon to confirm the new nominations. President Jefferson submitted to the Senate January 11, 1803, for confirmation the nominations of James Monroe and Robert R. Livingston as commissioners with full powers to enter into a treaty with the First Consul of France for the purpose of enlarging and more effectually securing our rights and interests in the River Mississippi and in the Territories eastward thereof. The nominations of J. Q. Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, and Jonathan Russell were advised and consented to by the Senate on January 16, 1814, and that of Albert Gallatin, who had been previously rejected on the grounds that the duties of an envoy were incompatible with those of the Secretary of the Treasury, on February 9, as ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace and a treaty of commerce with Great Britain.

For other early cases of confirmations by the Senate of special commissioners appointed to negotiate treaties, see Executive Journal I, pages 265, 310, 311, 432, 440; II, pages 25, 29.

TREATY OF GHENT, DECEMBER 24, 1814.

WAR OF 1812.

On April 17, 1813, President Madison, having accepted the offer of the Russian Government to mediate between the United States and Great Britain, appointed Albert Gallatin, James A. Bayard, and John Quincy Adams as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain. On May 29, 1813, Madison sent these nominations to the Senate for confirmation. A debate immediately arose as to whether the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury, which office Gallatin was then holding, were compatible with those of envoy extraordinary. On July 19, 1813, the Senate confirmed the nominations of Bayard and Adams, but by the close vote of 18 to 17 rejected the nomination of Gallatin. The British Government now refused to accept the offer of Russian mediation, and instead offered to treat directly with the United States. This offer President Madison hastened to accept, and on January 14, 1814, he nominated John Quincy Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, and Jonathan Russell as the new commissioners to negotiate directly with Great Britain. Four days later, January 18, 1814, with but little opposition in the Senate, these nominations were confirmed. On February 9, 1814, Gallatin was once more nominated by President Madison as one of the envoys to negotiate the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and on this occasion his appointment was promptly confirmed by the Senate. On December 24, 1814, the treaty was signed at Ghent, and on February 16, 1815, it was unanimously ratified by the Senate.

In 1826 President John Quincy Adams nominated Richard C. Anderson and John Sergeant as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the assembly of American nations at Panama. Their power and duty were to conclude treaties of peace, friendship, commerce, navigation, maritime law, neutral and belligerent rights, and all other matter interesting to the American nations with the ministers of that assembly from all or any of the nations of America. These nominations were sent by the President to the Senate and were duly confirmed. Mr. Anderson died the following year, and his successor, Joel R. Poinsett, was similarly nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

On February 9, 1871, President Grant sent the following message to the Senate with relation to the appointment of commissioners to consider the Alabama claims:

"The British minister accredited to this Government recently, in compliance with instructions from his Government, submitted a proposal for the appointment of a joint high commission, to be composed of members to be named by each Government, to hold its session at Washington and to treat and discuss the mode of settling the different questions which have arisen out of the fisheries, as well as those which affect the relations of the United States toward the British possessions in North America. I did not deem it expedient to agree to the proposal unless the consideration of the questions growing out of the acts committed by the vessels which have given rise to the claims known as the Alabama claims were to be within the subject of discussion and settlement by the commission. The British Government having assented to this, the commission is expected shortly to meet. I therefore nominate as such commissioners, jointly and separately, on the part of the United States:

"Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

"Robert C. Schenck, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain.

"Samuel Nelson, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Ebenezer Hoar, of Massachusetts.

"George H. Williams, of Oregon.

"I communicate herewith the correspondence which has passed on this subject between the Secretary of State and the British minister."

The following day the Senate confirmed all five nominations.

In 1880 President Hayes nominated James B. Angell, John F. Swift, and William Henry Trescot as commissioners plenipotentiary to conclude a treaty with China for the "settlement of such matters of interest as are now pending before the two Governments." These nominations were sent to the Senate and in due course confirmed.

It should be noted that in most of the foregoing instances the President and the Senate were, at the time, of the same political party. The consideration which led to the submission to the Senate could scarcely have reflected any partisan point of view. The submission must have resulted from the feeling that in so important matters as those pending the President would naturally welcome the advice and approval of the Senate. The majority of your committee thinks that precisely the same conditions exist in the present instance. It is true that in the majority of cases the nominations of the President have not been presented to the Senate. But this circumstance in no way alters the significance of the precedents cited, some of which involved the most crucial questions in our history, some of which involved, on the contrary, matters of relatively minor consequence.

Article 2, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Members of the House are familiar with the vast number of appointments, many of them to minor and inconsequential offices, which must nevertheless be confirmed by the Senate. By Revised Statutes, section 3830, for example, every postmaster of the first, second, and third class "shall be appointed and may be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Indeed, the foregoing language of the Constitution itself points out that appointments by the Executive alone—without the concurrence of the Senate—should be limited to "inferior officers" only. The majority of the committee is unwilling to belittle the representatives to the forthcoming international conference by regarding them as "inferior officers."

An additional reason for requiring confirmation in the case of representatives to future international conferences seems to result from the already quoted provisions of the deficiency act of 1913 requiring that thereafter all such conferences should be held only in the event that specific authority had been granted by Congress. If Congress deemed it important thenceforward to authorize the mere holding of a conference, it would seem natural and logical that Congress should all the more interest itself in the personnel of the Members who were to represent the United States at the conference.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the extension of the invitation, and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to the powers concerned, to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
September 10, 1919.

THE PRESIDENT:

During the course of the discussions in the Council of Five, regarding the disposition to be made of German cables, the following agreement was reached:

"The principal and allied and associated powers shall as soon as possible arrange for the convoking of an international congress to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis."

I learn that the four principal allies, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, have accepted, in principle, the suggestion to meet in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to them, for the purpose of making a study of the entire communications problem in all its aspects, which would include a consideration of the broader activities of the international telegraph and radiotelegraph unions of the interallied radio commission. I am convinced that the proposed conference offers a rare opportunity not only to provide the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis, but to promote world peace, mutual understanding, and fellowship arising from a communications system free from special privileges and placing each part of the world in immediate contact with every other part.

The Executive being prohibited by a provision of the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, from extending an invitation of this nature without specific authority of law, I have the honor to request that, should you approve, this matter be laid before Congress for its decision as to whether it will authorize the extension of the formal invitation and will provide the appropriation of $75,000, which it is thought will be required for United States representation in this international conference.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1919.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington.

MY DEAR MR. ROGERS: In reply to your oral request for an itemized estimate of the expenditures contemplated from the appropriation of $75,000 which I have recommended for the expenses of the proposed international telegraphic conference to be held in Washington in the near future, I take pleasure in inclosing, for the information of the committee, itemized lists of the expenses of two similar conferences, which may afford the committee some assistance.

There has, so far, been no meeting of the representatives of the Governments interested for the preparation of a program for the international telegraphic conference for the very obvious reason that there is as yet no legislative authorization for the holding of the conference. Therefore it is not possible to outline with any definiteness the manner in which the appropriation estimated is to be expended.

In a general way it is believed that the expenses of the Fifteenth International Congress of Hygiene and Demography and those of the United States section of the International High Commission, inclosed, may afford the committee a fairly accurate guide as to the manner in which the proposed $75,000 appropriation would be expended. It is not likely, however, that the delegates representing the United States at the telegraphic conference will be paid compensation, certainly not in any large amount, but it will be necessary, in all probability, to pay compensation to the technical experts, and it would naturally be expected that the expenses of delegates and experts should be paid. The number of delegates and experts will depend entirely upon the scope of the conference as it may be agreed upon by the participating Governments or limited by Congress itself. If, for example, its labors be confined to communication by submarine cable, the need of experts would be limited accordingly; but if the subject of radio telegraphy and telephony should be included, the number of technical experts and advisers would have to be greatly increased, as well as the number of clerks and other employees.

Then, too, there is the matter of preparation for the conference after a program shall have been adopted. It is known, for example, that at least one great Government has already a commission at work studying the whole subject of communications. As soon as Congress shall have authorized the holding of a conference, it will be necessary for the United States to organize a commission of the best known experts of the Government to make important technical studies and collect and coordinate information for the use of the American delegates when appointed. This preliminary work will be of the utmost importance to the proper protection of American interests at the conference and will require an expenditure of a considerable amount of money for clerical assistance, printing, possibly separate quarters, and perhaps compensation of experts.

With reference to your inquiry as to whether delegates should be confirmed by the Senate, I would suggest that it is not customary to stipulate that delegates to the conference shall be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I think it would be wise to omit that stipulation. Even if we expected to negotiate a treaty, it would not, in my opinion, be customary or desirable that the delegates should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but it is not the purpose to have the delegates to the International Telegraphic Conference negotiate a treaty, but rather, by a consideration of the subjects of communications in all its phases in relation to the views held by other Governments, to develop a basis upon which negotiations for an international convention may be undertaken by the regularly constituted agencies of the Government, provided the international regulation of communications shall ultimately be deemed desirable and practicable.

I hope the foregoing may prove, in substance, a satisfactory answer to your inquiry, and that the committee may find it practicable to recommend the appropriation in accordance with the estimate. I am, my dear Mr. ROGERS,

Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

Hon. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

INCREASE OF PAY OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3383) to increase the efficiency of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Public Health Service, and I submit a report (No. 318) thereon.

This bill increases the pay of officers and enlisted men of all five of the services recited in the title. It may be said, probably with justice, that the Committee on Military Affairs invaded the jurisdiction of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations, which ordinarily would have jurisdiction over any legislation affecting the pay of the Navy and the pay of the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service. We have taken this action after consulting with several members of the Naval Affairs Committee and of the Committee on Appropriations. We have done it primarily in order that there shall be embodied in one bill one system for increasing the pay of all these services. I invite the attention of Senators who are members of the Naval Affairs Committee and of the Appropriations Committee to the provisions of the bill and to the report which accompanies it, which will be printed, and which I will see is distributed to Members by to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF COPYRIGHT LAW.

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on Patents I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3754) to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909, and I submit a report (No. 326) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill first be read, Mr. President, in order that we may understand what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 8 and 21 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the author or proprietor of any work made the subject of copyright by this act, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall have copyright for such work under the conditions and for the terms specified in this act: Provided, however, That the copyright secured by this act shall extend to the work of an author or proprietor who is a citizen or subject of a foreign State or nation only:

"(a) When an alien author or proprietor shall be domiciled within the United States at the time of the first publication of his work; or

"(b) When the foreign State or nation of which such author or proprietor is a citizen or subject grants, either by treaty, convention, agreement, or law, to citizens of the United States the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as to its own citizens, or copyright protection substantially equal to the protection secured to such foreign author under this act or by treaty; or when such foreign State or nation is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which agreement the United States may, at its pleasure, become a party thereto.

"The existence of the reciprocal conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the President of the United States, by proclamation made from time to time, as the purposes of this act may require: Provided, however, That all works made the subject of copyright by the laws of the United States first produced or published abroad after August 1, 1914, and before the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of which the authors or proprietors are citizens or subjects of any foreign State or nation granting similar protection for works by citizens of the United States, the existence of which shall be determined by a copyright proclamation issued by the President of the United States, shall be entitled to the protection conferred by the copyright laws of the United States from and after the accomplishment, before the expiration of 15 months after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, of the conditions and formalities prescribed with respect to such works by the copyright laws of the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any person of any right which he may have acquired by the republication of such foreign work in the United States prior to the approval of this act.

"SEC. 21. That in the case of a book first published abroad in the English language on or after the date of the President's proclamation of peace, the deposit in the copyright office, not later than 60 days after its publication abroad, of one complete copy of the foreign edition, with a request for the reservation of the copyright and a statement of the name and nationality of the author and of the copyright proprietor and of the date of publication of the said book, shall secure to the author or proprietor an ad interim copyright, which shall have all the force and effect given to copyright by this act, and shall endure until the expiration of four months after such deposit in the copyright office."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is next to impossible to entirely understand the meaning of the bill without having the law which it seeks to amend before us. I will, therefore, ask the Senator briefly to explain just what changes in the copyright act of 1909 are provided for in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the only change is contained in the provisos. During the war, because of the interference with commerce and transportaion, it has been a physical impossibility for authors, particularly those of England and America, to comply with the copyright laws of the two countries and to copyright their works in both countries.

In the trading-with-the-enemy act we made provision for copyrights in the case of citizens of enemy countries during the war, so that at present authors in Germany and Austria have advantages over authors in the allied countries.

This bill merely extends the time within which authors may comply with the law. For instance, it gives an American author time to get his work to England and to comply with the English law, and the British author is given the same privilege here.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the bill affects only the copyrighting of books and periodicals from August, 1914, up to the date of the passage of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. While I am not an expert and, therefore, am not familiar with the copyright laws, I do not think there can be any possible doubt about the necessity and advisability of passing this proposed law. I think that will be made entirely clear if the Senator from Utah will read the communications which have been received from the Secretary of State, from the registrar of copyrights, and also from the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator's explanation of the bill is entirely satisfactory, and that the bill ought to be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

ENFORCEMENT OF PEACE TERMS UPON GERMANY.

Mr. KING. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) authorizing the President of the United States to employ the armed forces of the United States in conjunction with the forces of the allied and associated powers for the enforcement of the terms of peace accepted by Germany was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the present Government of Germany is manifesting bad faith with respect to the execution of the terms of peace accepted by Germany, which condition may require the enforcement of such terms by military measures which should properly be taken by the allied and associated powers in concert, according to the recommendations of the supreme council at Paris: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, is hereby authorized to employ the armed military, naval, and aerial forces of the United States in conjunction with the forces of the allied and associated powers in any cooperative or joint measures which may be undertaken for the military enforcement of the terms of peace accepted by Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the joint resolution to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. KING. I think that is the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING. I have no objection whatever to that course being pursued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator introducing the joint resolution by what rule of consistency the United States can be asked to enforce upon Germany the recognition and performance of a treaty which we ourselves have rejected?

Mr. KING. That may be the subject of consideration later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us not go into that now. Let us close the morning hour. If there are no further bills or joint resolutions, concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

TREATY BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA.

Mr. BORAH. I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 248) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of all correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain relative to the treaty negotiated between Great Britain and Persia during and about the time the treaty with Germany was being negotiated at Versailles.

WAR RISK BUREAU CLAIMS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 249) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is directed to inform the Senate whether or not claims for compensation for total or partial disability under the war-risk act are promptly disposed of and acted upon by said bureau; and if not, what is the cause of the delay therein? The said director is also directed to inform the Senate in general the status of the work of said office, with reference to the disposition of claims pending therein, and if said work is not being conducted so as to act promptly upon claims as presented currently to inform the Senate the causes of said delay.

Also, the said director is directed to inform the Senate the nature of the administrative organization in the said War Risk Bureau for deciding upon the allowance or rejection of claims of soldiers for disability on account of sickness, wounds, or other injuries received in line of duty; the rules and regulations adopted by the said bureau for the determination of the amounts due to such claimants under the law; and whether or not the law is being administered liberally to accomplish the purposes and objects for which it was intended or whether it is being strictly construed by the said bureau with the object and purpose of reducing to the lowest possible limit the liability of the Government thereunder.

LIMIT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KING. I offer a resolution, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 250) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That in the preparation of the appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, it is the sense of the Senate that the committees of Congress having in charge preparation of such bills should limit the amount of appropriations to the gross amount of not more than $3,000,000,000.

PERSONNEL OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. KING. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Whereas the extraordinary expansion of the personnel of the various executive departments made necessary by the extraordinary services required during the prosecution of the war against Germany has fulfilled its purpose and the need for the services of numerous employees has ceased: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the various executive departments in the city of Washington should forthwith dispense with and discontinue the services of at least 40,000 clerks and employees presently upon the rolls of such departments.

Mr. KING. I offer the following resolution and ask that it lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 253) was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor are hereby severally directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the names of all persons having official positions in their several departments who are authorized to exercise or do exercise any supervision over or direction of other employees and who are members of or affiliated with any labor union affiliated with the so-called American Federation of Labor or organized independent thereof, as the case may be.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
8 December, 1919.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9755, an act to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for just a brief moment. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], is not at present in the Chamber, but I know that it had been his intention at this time to address the Senate briefly on the subject of the conference report on the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

I am not going to ask the Senate to consider the conference report at this time, but I do desire to leave this thought in the minds of Senators, and I think the importance of the measure justifies the very few moments that I shall take of the Senate's time.

Last week when the conference report was brought up for consideration the question arose as to the feeling and wishes of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who had been active in the Senate when the bill was before the Senate for discussion. The bill finally passed the Senate unanimously, went to the House, and passed the House with various amendments. It then went to conference; the conferees have now unanimously reported the bill; and the conference report likewise has been unanimously concurred in by the other House.

I thoroughly appreciate the ethics and courtesies of the Senate—it is unnecessary for me to make that statement, I am sure—and having been the sponsor for the bill, I want every courtesy to be shown the Senator from North Dakota. However—and I am sure the Senator from Utah will bear me out in my statement, for he discussed the matter briefly last week—when the question of the future action of the Senate on the conference report was taken up, I think on Thursday last, we waited for a day with the idea that the Senator from North Dakota should be apprised of the facts and in order that we might obtain his viewpoint. He replied by telegram—which was referred to in the debate on Friday last, as reference to the RECORD of that day will show—that his desire was that the conference report should be returned to the committee of conference. He expressed no desire in that telegram, as I recall—and I think I am correct—that we should await his return, but said that he should like to see the report returned to conference. On that question I would be more than delighted to have the Senate pass, for I have no desire whatever to deny any opportunity for the consideration of a question of that character, which, of course, must be left to the Senate's judgment. Rather I am anxious to secure action. Frankly, I think the Senator from North Dakota should be congratulated in that he expressed his opinion and did not ask the Senate of the United States to await his return. I understand, however, from the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] that since then the Senator from North Dakota has wired that he expected to be here in a few days and would appreciate it if the Senate of the United States would await his return.

Of course, the only question which can be considered, as I understand the procedure, is the question whether the conference report shall be agreed to or whether it shall be referred back to the committee on conference. That is the only question that can arise in connection with the conference report, whether the Senator from North Dakota is here or otherwise. As I said in prefacing my remarks, I am not going to press the question this morning, but it does seem to me, in a matter affecting the business of this great country and of this body, that it is rather an unusual thing to wait 10 days on the personal convenience of any Senator, when the question can only be the one question which I have announced, namely, as to whether or not the report shall be agreed to or whether it shall go back to conference.

I should unquestionably object to its going back to conference, because, as I understand, there is only one question at issue at all, and that question I am fully prepared to discuss, but will not take the time of the Senate to discuss it now. I want, however, to leave this thought in the minds of the Senate; and I think it is extremely important. I appreciate the great importance of the railroad measure, and the country is awaiting to-day the official policy settled as to the future of railroad control and management; but I do not think, perhaps, in the midst of that discussion that we have appreciated fully the great importance of financing the ten billion dollar annual turnover of this country represented in exportations. Certainly every legislator knows and every business man knows that the condition of exchange as against this country is worse than it has ever been in the history of the world, with the pound sterling selling, according to the latest reports, at $3.87½, practically $1 under the average exchange of 4.86, or thereabouts, which, of course, is the normal rate. We can not sell American goods except where it is absolutely essential and imperative for foreign nations to buy them from us, when, because of the difference in exchange, they are compelled to pay to us from 25 to 100 per cent excess and more in order to pay for the goods. So there is not a question to-day of more importance for this body to settle and dispose of than to try to prepare the machinery—and this bill is designed to do that—so that we can, by taking over foreign securities and handling them in a banking manner, help to solve this great problem.

Our national prosperity unquestionably depends upon a condition of national contentment, and national contentment depends to a great extent upon production. You can not increase production, you can not stimulate production, if you are going to narrow the markets. We have a merchant marine to-day of thirteen hundred and odd ships. The whole purpose and thought back of the merchant marine when we spent hundreds of millions of dollars upon it—and we are now asked in the present budget to appropriate another half billion dollars for it—the only thought back of the merchant marine, of course, was to carry the goods of the American farmers and the American manufacturers to all parts of the world.

We have in the country a condition of social unrest and labor unrest which is more or less influenced by the conditions of production and employment, and we should not consume the time of the Senate on quibbles, on questions of detail concerning this measure, when it is so important to the future prosperity of the country to stabilize financial conditions.

Mr. MCLEAN. Is the Senator referring to Senate bill 2472?

Mr. EDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCLEAN. I wish to say that on Friday last I gave notice that on Monday I would ask the Senate to consider the conference report, but on Saturday I received a telegram from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] requesting that the report be withheld until his return to Washington some day this week. Under the circumstances, I felt that courtesy ought to be extended to the Senator from North Dakota, as he is deeply interested in this matter; but I sincerely hope that as soon as he returns the Senate will take immediate action upon the conference report, for its importance can not be minimized.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the question I am about to ask is not a very fair one. I entirely agree with the Senator from New Jersey and think that the measure ought to be passed; we want to stimulate our export trade; but does not the Senator think that the argument which he is making will not commend itself to the extreme protectionists? Is not the disparity in exchange in harmony with the protectionist theory, in that it serves as a tariff barrier, and we do not need to pass any tariff legislation to keep out cheap products from abroad?

Mr. EDGE. I shall be glad to discuss the question of the tariff with the Senator from Utah at any time. I see its relationship perfectly clearly, but Europe can not import in great quantities until it is rehabilitated. But just a brief word in conclusion. This measure and its immediate importance certainly must appeal to the American Senate, as I am sure it does to the American people. We have advanced about $9,000,000,000 abroad. It is a well-known fact that they can not pay us unless we help to rehabilitate to some extent the industrial life and activity of the various countries abroad.

In general answer to the Senator from Utah, I will say that we can only stabilize exchange in three ways that I have ever heard of. One is by imports; and while of course we are getting a certain volume of imports, we will get more if we help rehabilitate them. The second way is by shipping gold, and they have not any gold to speak of. The third way, of course, is by our purchasing their securities.

These banks are to be organized under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board. It is simply an evolution and a natural development of the banking system of the country, entirely in control of American interests, with American directors. The bill has been protected in both Houses with restrictive clause after restrictive clause. My only fear is that perhaps it is overrestrictive; but I do appeal to the Senate, in the interest of the business of the country, that there should be no further delay.

I am satisfied that the Senate of the United States shall await the return of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I consider it the courteous thing to do; but, again, may I repeat, there is only one question that the Senate can then decide: Shall the bill go back to a conference committee which has reported it unanimously or shall such report be concurred in on the floor of the Senate? That is all we can decide with the Senator from North Dakota in the Chamber or out of the Chamber.

I sincerely trust, in the interest of stabilization, in the interest of the employment of labor, in the interest of using our merchant marine, in the interest of helping the producers and business men of the country, any little prejudice, if it does exist, any question of banking interests if such questions do exist, will be considered and balanced with our duty to try to help the farmer and the producer and the manufacturer to be paid for the goods they sell and produce.

I can not see how any friend of the farmer, when we consider the grain situation in the Northwest or when we consider the cotton situation in the South, can be in anything but absolute accord with the passage and the enactment into law as quickly as possible of this constructive measure. It is not in the interest of the large banks, and I just want to refer to that in conclusion. It can not be in their interest. To-day the large banking concerns are organized under State charters, as is well known, and the Government has no supervision over them under a State charter. They go ahead and handle their financial and investment matters in their own way. Under this bill we immediately put under the supervision of a Federal board, and one that has certainly won the confidence of the country in its control and general supervision of the banking system of this country, every corporation organized under this act. For the first time we absolutely control the issue of debentures or bonds by a governmental body. So I can not see where there can be any justifiable reason for delay in the enactment and final passage of this important measure.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is expected to return?

Mr. McLEAN. The telegram states that the Senator expects to return this week.

It proposes to amend paragraph 8 of section 3 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, by striking out the words "the salaries and expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and of farm-loan registrars and examiners authorized by this section shall be paid by the United States," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Federal Farm Loan Board shall have power to levy semiannually upon the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks, in proportion to their gross assets, an assessment sufficient to pay its estimated expenses and the salaries of its members and employees for the half year succeeding the levying of such assessment, together with any deficit carried forward from the preceding year, the first assessment to be made for the half year beginning January 1, 1920."

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has already been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it has been read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE COAST GUARD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] desires to make an explanation of Senate joint resolution 102 I shall withdraw my objection, reserving the right to object until I hear his explanation.

Mr. NELSON. I should like very much to have that joint resolution taken up. The situation is this:

During the war the Coast Guard Service was attached to the Navy, and the members of its personnel were getting the pay that naval officers and men were getting. Since the war, within the last three or four months, the Coast Guard Service was detached from the Navy, and that puts them back at the old pay that existed long before the war, which is much less than the officers and men in the Navy are getting. They perform as important a work and as hazardous a work as that performed in the Navy, and there is no reason why they should not be put on a par with the officers and men of the Navy.

The Coast Guard now is composed of two former services. The original service was known as the Revenue-Cutter Service, and attached to that was the Life-Saving Service. Those two services together constitute the Coast Guard. They are performing a great work for the country, and there is no reason why the officers and men connected with this important service should not be put on a par with the officers and men in the Navy. That is the whole purpose of this joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does this joint resolution for all time fix the status of the officers and men in this service, or is it just for the current year?

Mr. NELSON. It is simply to put them on a par with the Navy. In case the Navy pay is reduced the pay of the Coast Guard would go with it. It simply puts them on a par with the officers and men of the Navy.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the Senator from Utah understands that this branch of the service was created out of the two divisions which the Senator from Minnesota has mentioned, namely, the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, on the theory that they were related to the Navy; that they were proper branches of the Navy under certain important conditions. They have been very useful in the service of the Navy during the late war and are very useful at all times—in fact, they are of the very greatest use—and there is no reason why one branch of the naval service should be treated differently from another branch. If the Senator looks into the matter he will be convinced, I am sure, that the Coast Guard is in the very nature of things of direct importance to the people of the United States not only in connection with the Navy but also in merchant marine and coastwise service. They are especially necessary in time of war, but their services in time of peace can not be overestimated. They save life and property, the latter a hundredfold of their expense to the Government

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not agree with the position which he takes at all nor with the conclusions which he draws. It seems to me that the service of men in the Navy is entirely different from that of those engaged in the Coast Guard. I can not see why an officer in the Coast Guard should have the same grade or the same compensation as a naval officer. Naval officers give their lives to the service and are educated at the expense of the Government. It seems to me to take the Coast Guard and elevate it to the same status as that occupied by the Navy is wholly improper, and if this bill purposes to do that I shall object to its consideration. I will not object, because of the exigencies of the hour and because, as I understand, a good many of the employees in the service are leaving because of the superior compensation obtained elsewhere, to a measure which permits, for the current year, the same compensation as those in the Coast Guard have received during the war. But to put them on the same status as the Navy for all time I should object to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, let me say further to the Senator that I am sure he does not understand the real situation, or else he would not say that the man who enters the Navy, devoting his life to the service of the country in its naval department, is assuming greater risks or is offering greater service and sacrifice to his country than are the men in the Coast Guard. In the first place, the revenue-cutter men are educated at the public expense also, as I understand, the same as are officers of the Navy. But the dangers to life in the Coast Guard Service are very much greater, year in and year out, than those connected with service in the Navy, and service in the Coast Guard is for life or until retired under the law. The Coast Guard officers are given retirement similar to that given to men in the Navy, except that their retirement is less valuable, having fewer and smaller benefits.

Mr. KING. The Senator is referring to the officers now, I suppose?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am speaking of the officers, who would be benefited by this bill. They do render naval service, and if the Senator was familiar with the work of the life savers and knew of the sacrifices they make and how they give up their lives in very many instances for the sake of the service in which they are engaged, I am sure he would not want to classify them below other officers in the Navy. It may not be exactly accurate to say that they are nominally officers of the Navy, but it is true in fact. During the recent war the Coast Guard Service was taken over by the Navy and its officers paid and ranked as naval officers. They should not now be discriminated against.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I just want to add one or two words. During the war, although I do not recall the date, this Coast Guard Service was attached to the Navy and performed their duties with the Navy. About a week ago I noticed that one of the Coast Guard vessels and the whole crew were sunk by a mine over in European waters.

Some people have a notion that the Coast Guard Service perform their duties altogether ashore. That is not true. Their boats are constantly plying along the coast of the United States, in the Alaskan waters, and in the West Indies waters, and since the Life-Saving Service was attached to the Coast Guard they have important duties in relieving wrecks and taking care of vessels that are out in a storm.

I can not conceive of any service that is more important and more hazardous, even in time of peace, than the Coast Guard Service. This is simply for the time being to put them in a position where they were six months ago. They were then attached to the Navy Department, and this is to put them right back, so that they can get the pay that they were getting then.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. There is another reason, if the Senator will allow me, and then I will yield to him. Owing to the matter of high wages prevailing throughout the country, it is very difficult now for the Coast Guard Service to get men to man their ships.

I want to say another thing before I sit down. The Coast Guard Service have a naval code of their own, prepared by the Committee on Commerce some years ago, and passed. Before that time they were simply in the condition of ordinary merchant sailors; but we prepared a naval code that regulates and controls the enlistment and discharge of the men, and they are now put on the retired list, but not on the same basis as officers in the Army and Navy.

Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. What I wanted to ask the Senator is what increase this bill would make in the annual expenditures.

Mr. NELSON. I am unable at this moment to give the Senator the figures. They will simply be put on a par with the officers and men in the Navy for the time being.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the bill; but I was somewhat interested to know how much it would add to the public burden.

Mr. NELSON. I am unable at this moment to give the size of the force.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret very much to be compelled to insist on my objection. I shall be very glad to take the matter up with the Senator from Minnesota and officials representing the Navy and the Coast Guard, and see if we can not prepare a bill at a very early date which will increase the compensation, or at least give these employees the same compensation for the coming year that they had during the war. But I am not willing to concur in legislation which would place them in the same category with the personnel of the Navy.

So as to make the bill read:

A petition in behalf of said Indians shall be filed in the Court of Claims within one year after the passage of this act, and the Iowa Tribe of Indians shall be the party plaintiff and the United States the party defendant, and the petition may be verified by the attorney employed by the said Iowa Tribe of Indians to prosecute their claim under this act, under contract to be approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, as provided by law, upon information and belief as to the facts alleged in said petition. CLAIM OF OWNERS OF STEAMER "TEXAS."

The bill (S. 1255) authorizing the Texas Co. to bring suit against the United States was announced as next in order and was read:

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the claim of the owners of the steamer Texas arising out of a collision between said steamer and the U. S. S. Frederick der Grosse off Tompkinsville, Staten Island, in the harbor of New York, on the 3d day of September, 1917, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owners of said steamer Texas by reason of damages to and detention of said steamer may be submitted to the United States court for the district of New York, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owners of said steamer Texas, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to allow the bill to be passed. It merely authorizes the bringing of a suit in the Federal courts in the State of New York.

Mr. KING. I will withdraw the objection for the present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] raised the point a few days ago that the report does not show that these parties had taken up the matter with the proper department of the Government. I have since ascertained that they made application to the Navy Department for redress, and that the Navy Department replied that it could not consider the claim because it amounted to more than $500; that the claimants would have to get special authority from Congress to bring a suit, and have the matter tried on its merits. That is all the bill proposes to do. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is not only for the repairs and the surveyors' fee in examining and reporting on the damages, and recommending the necessary repairs, but it is for $16,425.48 for the loss of the time the steamer was out of commission.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is to be tried out in the courts. If there is no legitimate basis for the claim, it will not be sustained. The Navy Department held that special congressional authority would be necessary in order that a suit might be brought.

Mr. SMOOT. I will refer to the report in a moment.

Mr. KING. While my colleague is doing that, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if he knows of any precedent for the Government being held liable for damages resulting from collisions of this character, and of loss of time growing out of the inability to use the vessel during the time it was being repaired?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That I do not know. But the passage of this bill would not of itself commit Congress to liability.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that whatever action is taken in this matter by Congress will virtually bind the Congress to pay the amount. I do not recall the Government ever having paid for the loss of time that it took to repair such boats. I know the general law authorizes the Navy Department to settle claims under $500, but in that settlement time is never considered in figuring an obligation against the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If that be correct, I feel sure the court would not sustain that part of the claim in so far as it relates to loss of time.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know about that, I am sure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the court should decide that the Government is bound, it would seem that these people would be entitled to redress. The bill provides for a trial on the merits.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the court would make a reasonable allowance for damages suffered; but the question is whether it would be the policy of Congress to allow for such damages as are alleged here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The object of the bill is not to commit Congress in any way, but to make possible a court decision. I assume the court will pass on the matter fairly and render whatever judgment is proper. How could the claim be properly adjudicated, except by the court, under the circumstances?

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that this boat is supposed to carry 9,770 tons, and they allow $6.50 per ton per month for the full tonnage of the boat and charge $2,116 per day, which is based on the rate of $6.50 per ton per month for the total tonnage of the boat. I think that is unreasonable. It is not very likely that the boat would have a load to its utmost capacity, nor is it very likely that the boat would be in commission carrying freight every day during the time that it took to repair it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would not the Senator feel safe in permitting the court to investigate that and pass on it?

Mr. SMOOT. I think Congress itself has acted on this question. The Senator knows there are a good many things that Congress has well settled in paying claims against the United States. It is quite different from claims between individuals and corporations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would not the court examine into that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3288.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to strike out section 7 of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have some views to express about the pending bill, Senate bill 3288, a bill to provide legislation for the return to their owners of the railroads of the country and to provide regulation of the operation of the roads. It is a most important subject of legislation and requires the most careful and serious thought of Congress. The railroads are the arteries of the commercial and industrial life of the country. All commercial and industrial life circulates through them. Without natural and unimpeded circulation, stagnation would follow, and if all circulation were stopped death would ensue not only to commerce and industry but actual physical death to vast numbers of people would ensue from starvation. Much is involved. Stockholders in railroad corporations should have a fair and sure return upon their investments; employees should have reasonable compensation and fair working conditions; but the interest of the public is more extensive than that of either. It is highly important that there be adequate, continuous, unimpeded service.

I shall principally address my remarks to-day to that feature of the bill which is intended to prevent interference with interstate commerce by railroad strikes. I am very heartily in favor of that provision of the bill. I think it absolutely necessary to the welfare and life of the people of the United States and to the good order and domestic tranquillity of the country. I believe it within the power of Congress to enact such legislation. The preamble to the Constitution of the United States recites that the Constitution is adopted, among other purposes, to insure domestic tranquillity. Without some means of prevention of nation-wide railroad strikes there can be no assurance of domestic tranquillity in this country. By the Constitution Congress is given power to regulate commerce among the several States. To regulate commerce among the several States certainly includes the power to prevent interference therewith or extinction thereof; without railroad transportation there could be but little commerce among the States. Interference with the United States mail is unlawful and punishable. Why should not interference with interstate commerce be made unlawful and punishable? Transmission of the mail is only one phase of interstate commerce. Transportation of passengers and freight is of more vital importance than transmission of mail.

I think the time has come when Congress should create a tribunal to hear and determine disputes between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, about wages and working conditions, with power to decree and enforce the granting of reasonable wages and fair working conditions. That is provided in the pending bill. Jurisdiction over such matters is given to the proposed transportation board, the proposed committee of wages and working conditions, and the proposed regional boards of adjustment. The bill provides for equal representation of employers and employees on the committee of wages and working conditions and the regional boards of adjustment. By this method employees will have a voice in fixing their wages and working conditions. They will no longer be compelled to accept whatever wages and working conditions their employers may offer or to quit their jobs. What is right and reasonable is to be determined by a fair, impartial tribunal, sitting as a judicial body, taking into consideration the interests of the public, the rights of investors, and the rights of employees. A penalty is provided to enforce decrees.

Manifestly, I think, as a corollary, this should be accompanied by a provision to prevent a nation-wide or territorially extensive railroad strike from being suddenly and arbitrarily precipitated upon the people of the country, to the utter paralysis of business and imperiling by starvation the lives of the people. If we are to get away from the old, haphazard system of allowing railroad companies to fix wages and working conditions and compelling employees to accept what is offered or to strike, if we are to get into a higher and fairer arena of adjudication, if we are to take into consideration the paramount interest of the people, if we are to make the subject one of judicial action, we should not end with providing that railroad companies must pay whatever wages and grant whatever working conditions may be decreed by a judicial tribunal and leave employees still free to plunge the country into desperation and bring it to starvation by a nation-wide strike. It would not be fair to bind employers and not employees. To be workable, to be fair, and to obtain the desired benefits some compulsion must be applied to each side. Employees should not have the benefit of a compulsory law to require employers to pay adequate wages and grant fair working conditions and still retain the power to destroy through the strike.

In my opinion, the time has come when the people are entitled to know whether their Government is to be supreme in the realm of domestic tranquillity, general welfare, law, and order, or whether a class of citizens, only a small part of the people, banded together by class organization, are to be supreme, whether the Government or organized labor is more powerful. If the Government is not supreme and the more powerful, the people should know it in order that they may take counsel and decide to submit to the inevitable or undertake to seek a remedy. Undoubtedly for many years capital was largely disregardful of the rights of the people and the general welfare. It engaged largely in the formation of trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and thereby fixed prices and wages and restricted production and worked much hardship upon the people. This rapacity continued until public sentiment was so aroused that it was reflected in Congress, and laws were enacted which were intended to curb, and have in a measure curbed, the rapacity of capital and made it much more responsive to reason and justice.

A new menace, however, has arisen, and it bids fair to be more dangerous, more tyrannical, more oppressive, more terrible, than the old menace or any other our country has ever known. It appears to have the power to destroy; not merely to oppress or harm but the absolute power to destroy. Apparently it believes it is possessed of that power and is disposed to use it unless it can have its way, regardless of the views and judgment of the whole people. It is the menace of organized labor, with its present tendencies and under radical control. I think organized labor has for quite a number of years been very fairly treated by the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government—nay more, generously treated. There had long been a feeling that there was an unequal distribution of wealth and opportunity in this country, and the whole trend of governmental action for a number of years has been to give labor a larger share of wealth and opportunity. This has continued until it appears to have created in organized labor a rapacity and greed that are appalling, accompanied by ominous threats that portend grave danger to the body politic.

Selfishness is not confined to capital. Selfishness is found in all elements of population. It is found in labor as well as capital. When unrestricted in either it is sure to go too far; sure to go so far as to interfere with the general good and welfare, which should always be supreme. Selfishness should be curbed in capital and labor alike. It should not be curbed in one and allowed to go unrestricted and run riot in the other. Selfishness is an element of human nature which should always be the care and object of legislation. It must be if popular government is to be a success. Unrestrained selfishness in any element of population will ruin fair and impartial government.

It was during the war with Germany that organized labor exhibited a rapacity that was not wholesome and appeared to become swollen with the consciousness of power. Undoubtedly there was extravagance on the part of the Government during that war. There had to be some. We had to win the war, regardless of cost. The winning of the war was paramount to all else. Cost was a minor incident. We entered the war late and had to make haste. Haste necessarily costs. It always does. Doubtless during the war there was some profiteering by capital. It was impossible to prevent all profiteering by capital. In gigantic contracts, hastily filled, there must be generally some large profit.

As a class labor was loyal during the war with Germany. It did its share toward the winning of the war and I give it credit for it. Without its help the war could not have been won, but in the main it was well paid for what it did. Its loyalty was accompanied by the highest wages ever known. There were repeated demands for increased wages and nearly all of them were granted. Some of them were unreasonable. Some were accompanied by express or implied threats to quit work if not granted. The Government and employers were not in a position to quibble about wages and nearly every demand was granted. During the war there were many workmen who received quite as much, half as much, or a third as much wages in a day as soldiers fighting in the trenches in France received in a month. In some essential industries, such as shipbuilding, some workmen received a much greater wage in a day than soldiers in the trenches received in a month. There was no great exception taken to this, because we had to win the war, regardless of cost. However, the experience of labor during the war, the wages received, and the readiness with which nearly every demand was granted appears to have given labor leaders a new consciousness of power and appears to have caused radical elements in labor circles to determine to go to great and unreasonable lengths in time of peace and to use the power acquired under stress of war for purposes of downright extortion; and this spirit unfortunately appears largely to have pervaded the entire ranks of organized labor.

There appear to be in labor circles a belief that labor is in the saddle and has things going its way, and a determination to go to the uttermost extremity, regardless of consequences, regardless of right or wrong, and regardless of the welfare of the country and the interests of the whole people. Coupled with this determination seems to be a feeling in labor circles that the Government is either powerless to resist extreme and extortionate demands of labor or on account of timidity dare not do so. There is some ground for this feeling.

For a long time both of the leading political parties have made a specialty of catering to organized labor. Nearly every demand has been granted. Organized labor has been coddled, babied, and toadied to until it is no wonder, with the fresh prestige gained during the war, labor feels that it is foolish not to demand anything its fancy may want. Especially of late years has labor been humored to an unreasonable and unwholesome extent. Bids have been made for the labor vote until the leaders of organized labor are so swollen with real or imagined power that they apparently feel they are in a position to dictate to the Government and exact anything they may desire.

In my opinion some serious mistakes have been committed in the policy of the Government toward labor. While it was the duty of the Government to curb with a firm hand the greedy rapacity of capital, there was no reason why the Government should have given labor carte blanche to go to any length or should have humored its every whim. I think the Adamson law was a grave mistake, and I think we are now reaping its consequences. I think much of the trouble which has since arisen in regard to the operation of railroads; much of the enormous deficit resulting from Government operation of railroads, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars; much of the net loss to the Government in the operation of railroads, at times amounting to more than a million dollars a day, may be traced to that act. It was the belief of many who acquiesced in the Adamson law that that was the last that would be heard of demands of railroad employees about wages for a generation or more; but immediately the Government took control of the operation of the railroads it was confronted by repeated demands for increased wages, and they were all granted, and the end is not yet.

I think it was a grave mistake to exempt farm and labor organizations from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law—Republican—and the Clayton antitrust law—Democratic. In my opinion, each was largely a bid for political support. In my opinion, very much of our domestic trouble since the signing of the armistice with Germany arose from those mistakes. Each year they have been confirmed by the action of Congress in putting in the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Justice a provision that none of the money appropriated should be used for the prosecution of farm or labor organizations for acts contrary to the inhibitions of antitrust laws. This has continued until in the minds of the beneficiaries of such exempting provisions there has apparently been formed a firm belief that their right to do things forbidden to other and less favored citizens has ripened into a vested right. In recent years there has occasionally been some feeble opposition in Congress to the insertion of such exempting provisions in appropriation bills, but without effect. At the last preceding session of Congress, when there was before the Senate a bill to make a deficiency appropriation for the Department of Justice, a determined effort was made by a few Senators to prevent the inclusion in the bill of the usual clause of exemption in favor of farm and labor organizations, but it was defeated by a margin of three votes. There was but a small attendance. Twenty-eight of us voted to strike out the usual exclusion clause and 31 voted against striking it out. The vote showed that a good many Senators were awakening to the unwisdom of class legislation.

All of my life I have been opposed to class legislation. I had long understood democracy to mean equal rights to all, special privileges to none, and no class legislation. However, democracy seems to have grown to mean equal rights to none, special privileges for all who have enough votes, class legislation for those strong enough to get it. It is not, however, my ideal of democracy. If one political party has indulged in class legislation and granted special privileges to the wealthy, that is no reason why its opponent should indulge in class legislation and grant special privileges to the class which has the most votes. Republican concessions of special privilege to those who have the most wealth and Democratic bestowal of special exemptions upon those who have the most votes are, in my opinion, equally wrong.

I believe in the original democratic doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, no matter how wealthy or numerous claimants for special privilege may be. I believe it is the true theory of democratic government. None should be allowed to follow their selfish interest to such an extent as to interfere with the common rights and general welfare of the whole people. All classes should be amenable to the law and all should be made subject to the general welfare and common good. To do otherwise is to endanger popular government and destroy democracy.

As a result of class legislation in favor of wageworkers, there has grown up in this country an inner government. It is inside of the regular or constitutional Government. It is not an invisible government. It is very visible. It does not operate under the surface or behind the scenes. It is bold and open and very much aboveboard. The inner government consists of combined organized labor, and it is a grave question if the inner government to-day is not superior to and more powerful than the constitutional Government. The inner government issues edicts and makes demands, and in the past they have largely been honored by the constitutional Government. If this is to continue constitutional government can not survive. In my opinion, it is timely and opportune to determine whether or not this shall continue until it may reach the point of the utter subversion or destruction of constitutional government. Shall the inner government or the constitutional government rule? The time and the opportunity to make the test are now at hand.

I believe there should be a test of strength between our Government and organized labor. Organized labor has been growing in power at a prodigious rate. It has become arrogant and domineering. If the test be longer postponed, when it may come it may be disastrous to constitutional government. I think it imperative that a test be had as soon as possible. The radical element of organized labor is evidently in the saddle and it does not mince words in its threats or demands. It bodes no good for the common weal. It seeks only advantage, power, benefits for itself. It appears to have no thought of the common welfare. The chief labor organizations of the country appear to have passed under radical control and that radical control is in many instances closely linked or nearly related to sovietism, bolshevism, and communism, so much so as to give strong ground for the belief that many of the radical leaders who are now leading large organizations of labor at a reckless pace have in mind a covert or thinly disguised purpose to internationalize the proletariat of the world and put it on the throne and either overthrow this Government or materially alter it, so that sovietism and not democracy shall characterize it. Some openly avow their purpose to sovietize the United States. Others do not, but appear to be working to that end.

Great labor leaders, heretofore regarded as prudent and conservative, who now appear to be unable to stem the rising tide of radicalism, apparently are disposed to drift with the radical tide rather than fight against it. The greatest labor leader in this country has been Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor. Heretofore I have had considerable respect for and confidence in Mr. Gompers. I thought his part during the War with Germany was well done, and I thought him entitled to much credit for it. I had regarded Mr. Gompers as a conservative force, a stabilizer of radical tendencies in labor circles, and thought him in a position to do great good. In fact, he has done some good, and I give him credit for it. Mr. Gompers, however, appears to have become unable or unwilling to stem the torrent of radicalism, and appears to have decided to drift with it rather than fight it.

In the great steel strike—a strike not conducted for higher wages or better working conditions, but to make the steel industry a closed industry, so no American citizen may obtain employment at it without first getting permission from an oligarchy of organized labor—Mr. Gompers joined hands with James Fitzpatrick, William V. Foster, and Jacob Margolis, and has stood for that for which they stand in that strike. He has stood shoulder to shoulder with them and has worked hand in hand with them. Margolis is a plain anarchist. I do not say Mr. Gompers subscribes to Margolis's anarchy, but he has stood with Margolis in the steel strike. Foster is a rabid syndicalist, a former avowed I. W. W., and, no doubt, still one at heart. Fitzpatrick was the ruling genius in the formation of a new labor party which recently held a national convention at Chicago and demanded the impeachment of Judge Anderson for issuing an injunction in the coal strike against the head officials of the United Mine Workers of America. Some of this convention's other demands were:

Abolition of the United States Senate.
Election of Federal judges by popular vote for terms not exceeding four years.
International solidarity of labor.
Maximum hours of labor for men and women to be 8 hours a day and 44 hours a week.
Minimum wage for workers to be fixed by law.
Old-age, unemployment, and sick pensions.
Government to own and operate the banking business of the country.
Nationalization of unused lands.
Incomes of individuals to be limited by law.
National initiative, referendum, and recall.
Application of the "home rule" principle in State, county, and city government.
Condemnation of government by injunction.
Repeal of the espionage law and all other repressive statutes passed during the war.
Condemnation of universal military training and conscription.
Immediate release of all political and industrial prisoners.
Nationalization of all public utilities and all basic industries.
Demand that all Government work be done by day labor instead of by contract.

The convention adopted a resolution condemning the peace treaty and league of nations covenant as at present drafted, for the reason that it did not conform with President Wilson's fourteen points and was not in the interest of the working classes of the world.

I do not say Mr. Gompers stands for Foster's syndicalism or all of the demands of Fitzpatrick's labor convention, but he has stood with those men in the steel strike. This goes to show that the radical, revolutionary element of labor is in control and that more conservative officials must submit to it or get out of the way. It shows the element of organized labor with which the Government has to contend. It shows the character of the menace.

When the unionized bituminous coal miners of the country, on the verge of winter, in violation of their express written contract, took advantage of the situation to undertake to freeze and starve the people of the country into submission to their most outrageous, extravagant, unreasonable, and extortionate demands, and when the Government, through the Department of Justice, a duly authorized agency, obtained an injunction against the leaders of that strike, from a duly constituted Federal court of competent jurisdiction, presided over by Judge Anderson—virtually an injunction against the action of a few men in undertaking to plunge the whole people of the country into starving and freezing conditions and to paralyze the entire industry and commerce of the country, in violation of law and of their contract—the executive council of the American Federation of Labor made common cause with the unlawful strike and, with Mr. Gompers presiding, defied the courts of the land and the Government. Mr. Gompers and his executive council openly assured the lawless strikers, who had their hands upon the throats of the Government and the whole people, that in their lawless stand they would have the absolute support and assistance in every possible way of the American Federation of Labor. The executive council of the American Federation of Labor issued a statement, which bristled in every line and sentence with defiance of the Government, the courts, and the law. It boldly challenged the Government to a test of strength.

I believe it was that action of the American Federation of Labor and those utterances of Mr. Gompers which caused the miners, despite the injunction, to remain on strike and defy the Government and bring its people, as they have, to the verge of death, through freezing and starving. It made a farce, a joke, of Judge Anderson's paper injunction. It was made nothing but a paper injunction. Organized labor defied the Government, and so far has made its defiance successful, successful to the verge of death and destruction. Is all of this to go unnoticed? Are we, the representatives of the people, the guardians of the Constitution, to take no heed of these things? Are we to take no warning? Are we to put a strait-jacket on railroad employers and say to them: "We will fix wages and working conditions of your employees and make you abide thereby, and at the same time leave this great power for destruction of all Government and society unbridled, unrestrained, and free to wreak its will upon the defenseless people at the dictate of tyrannical masters, some of them clearly bent on sovietism and bolshevism?"

Great as are the opportunities for arbitrary action of radical labor elements and scheming labor leaders, to the detriment of the general welfare, in coal mining, the steel industry, manufacturing industries, and other industrial lines, I believe the ability to wreck, ruin, desolate, and paralyze, and to bring to people death from starvation exceeds in railroad transportation that of all the others. I believe if a nation-wide railroad strike should be instituted, as has been more than once threatened, and if it should be successful in a complete tie-up of the railroads for a period of two weeks, it would cause the death by starvation of from five to ten millions of people of the country, mostly in the large cities. New York City, it is said, never has provisions on hand for more than 48 hours ahead. We have had a coal-miners' strike, contrary to law, for five weeks. Why not a nation-wide railroad strike for two weeks? If there are elements of organized labor which are determined, and if there are scheming labor leaders who are determined, to have their way or pull down the temple of Government in ruin upon the heads of all—and I think the events of the last few months leave no room to doubt it—I believe the railroads of the country afford the most effective avenue. That this avenue has been chosen by some appears plain.

Last summer, when crops were to be moved, when the cost of living was a sore burden to millions of people, when it was the duty of every patriotic citizen to struggle along for the time being as best he could and help to reduce the cost of living and help change war conditions to prewar conditions, when the Government had paid out of the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars to operate the railroads and was then operating them at a loss of a million dollars a day, a sudden, unexpected, concerted descent was made upon Congress by the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods with demands for an increase of wages and for the adoption of the Plumb plan of so-called nationalization of the railroads; in fact, nothing but sovietism.

The imperious demand was made that these things be done at once, and, if not, a nation-wide railroad strike was threatened. President Wilson threw himself into the breach and, by appealing for time and promising to make every effort to reduce the cost of living in a short time, he succeeded in procuring an armistice, and the threatened calamity was held in abeyance, but kept over the heads of the people of the country.

Taking warning, very soon thereafter earnest work was begun and continuously prosecuted by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I have the honor to be a member, upon the framing of legislation to turn back to their owners the railroads of the country and to prevent the possibility of such a fearful calamity as a nation-wide railroad strike. The pending bill resulted. The brotherhood leaders, so far, have complainingly withheld direct action, but there are continual rumblings of a disposition to turn lose the thunderbolt. The taste of the Adamson law and subsequent successive tastes have whetted their appetites.

At a hearing which was granted to labor leaders by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which framed this bill, upon the proposed provision against railroad strikes Mr. Gompers and other labor leaders appeared before the committee and violently opposed the antistrike provision of the bill. Mr. Gompers, in particular—and others, too—said if the provision were enacted it would not be obeyed. They announced that they would defy it. Mr. Gompers said he would have no hesitancy in advising railroad workers to disobey it. In short, he and his associates defied the Government and set themselves up as more powerful than the Government. The inner government against constitutional government! The inner government professed to be more powerful than the constitutional government and declared a test of strength against the latter. I for one am in favor of accepting the challenge. I do not believe it should be passed over. I believe now is the time to make the supreme test. The majesty of the law has been challenged, is being challenged every minute!

In my State to-day the people are in the dire extremity of deep distress. Thousands of innocent, law-abiding men, women, and children are suffering cruel deprivation under the iron heel of a merciless oligarchy's tyranny. Thermometers register many degrees below zero. Deep snows cover the ground and biting blizzards sweep the State. Thousands of people are out of fuel. Many are tearing down their barns and other outbuildings and fences for fuel. Some are reported to be burning their furniture. Schools and churches are closed. Newspapers are suspended. My latest advices are that the large mines and smelters of the State have closed for lack of fuel, throwing thousands of workmen out of work, from 12,000 to 18,000, and stopping their wages. I have no doubt thousands are suffering misery. This is horrible, shocking, revolting! That such a state of affairs can exist in America is appalling. Did ever people have greater cause for grievance against our Government that such things can be? Are we helpless to remedy this terrible condition, brought about by the merciless tyranny of the inner government? If not, the power of the constitutional government should be asserted and enforced.

If the law-breaking coal miners win their strike, constitutional government is ended in the United States; our liberty and security are gone. In that event we shall have to crawl submissively upon our hands and knees and servilely bow to the dictates of the inner government of organized labor, just as Congress has been crawling and bowing to its dictates, the result of which the country is now reaping.

Rebellion is in the land! It is bold, sullen, defiant. The United Mine Workers of America are openly defying constituted authority, law, Government, courts, a court injunction. I have no doubt their leaders and officials are conniving at, inciting, instigating, encouraging this defiance. I have no doubt there are other labor leaders in high places who are aiding and counseling. A decree of a high court has been ruthlessly trampled in the dust. The titanic grapple of our Government with a gigantic force within is at hand.

Shall the majesty of the law be upheld? There is no majesty more imposing, of greater grandeur, of more sublime proportions than the majesty of the law. Like divine omniscience, it may be defied, trampled upon, violated; it can not be destroyed. It is everywhere. It may be denied, but it exists. It may be pushed aside, but it resumes its sway. It is supreme in right and in conscience it will be vindicated. None can violate it without injustice to others, injury to themselves. America is going through an ordeal. Shall we be heedless, as in the past, and not prepare for the future? If the coal miners' strike should be by the Government compromised in such a way as to put one cent more of cost upon the public, in my opinion it would be a mistake that would return to plague it for many years to come. I do not believe it should be compromised. I believe the Government should stand on the offer made by Dr. Garfield, accepted by the operators, and fight it out on that. The Government has declared this an unlawful strike, and I do not believe in compromising with lawlessness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator made any investigation as to the increased cost of coal, either to the operators or to the public, in the 14 per cent advance which has been suggested by the Fuel Administrator, Dr. Garfield?

Mr. MYERS. I have not. I have taken Dr. Garfield's statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator know that that would increase the cost of production $107,000,000, in addition to the previous advance made by the Fuel Administrator?

Mr. MYERS. I have heard those figures given. I have no doubt they are correct.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am leading up to this question: Is the Senator of the opinion that that $107,000,000 placed upon the operators is a proper charge against the operators? Should that increase be made if the miners are now getting sufficient wages?

Mr. MYERS. No; if the miners are receiving sufficient wages it should not be granted. I am only saying that the Government having seen fit to authorize and back up Dr. Garfield's statement and his attitude, it should fight it out on that stand and not recede one iota from it. I have simply taken Dr. Garfield's announcement of the result of his investigation of the cost of coal production; that is, that the coal operators could stand that much of an increase and have some profit left. I have not investigated the subject myself. I am relying upon Dr. Garfield's statement, which I have no reason to doubt.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator in his speech.

Mr. MYERS. I am quite willing to be interrupted to any extent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But I think the Senate should understand this question, as the Senator has mentioned the fact.

Mr. MYERS. I would be pleased to have the Senator from New Jersey make any statement he may think would shed light on the question. I am sure anything he might say would be enlightening.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand, the 14 per cent advance is supposed to be taken out of the income of the operators?

Mr. MYERS. That is my understanding.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is imposed under war powers granted in the Lever bill, giving the Fuel Administrator power and authority to readjust the wage scale. The legislation will expire by limitation when the President shall proclaim peace, and therefore it is reasonable to assume that in six months, or a year at least, those powers will expire by limitation. But the advance imposed upon the public of $107,000,000 added cost is a wage agreement extending to two and a half years from the present time, and every effort to reduce the price of coal or readjust those wages is tied up under a contract for two and a half years, and there will be no authority of law to readjust them. I believe that at the present time the wages of the miners are sufficient, that they are earning war-time wages, and that they should not be increased. I intend to show definitely in the Senate at some future time what these miners have been making, wages the minimum of which is $1,500 a year and the maximum $4,500 to $4,800 a year.

Mr. MYERS. I agree substantially with what the Senator from New Jersey has said. I was merely saying that the Government having authorized Dr. Garfield's offer and having put itself back of it and having taken a stand on it I do not believe the Government should recede one iota from the stand it has taken, but believe the Government should at least fight it out on that stand and along that line; and if there be made any compromise which will go one particle beyond that I think it will rise to plague the Government for many years to come. It would be an abandonment of a stand as to principle.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I merely wish to say that I am entirely in accord with the Senator's view.

Mr. MYERS. I think this Government should show that it can take a stand for what is right and stay with it in the face of defiance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This, of course, is true, that Dr. Garfield was better qualified, probably, than anyone else in the United States to ascertain what would be a reasonable advance to the men; and the fact that he made a decision which was not far from the reasonable one is indicated by the further fact that most of the operators indicated a disposition to accept his judgment in the matter. It may be that this 14 per cent increase in wages amounts to a very large sum—$107,000,000, or whatever it may be. But as large as it is, after all, it is only a 14 per cent advance, and it seems to me that the Senator from Montana is occupying a very strong position when he takes the attitude that this decision having been made by the proper constituted authority it is now the duty of everyone to stand by it and see that it is carried out.

Mr. MYERS. The duty of the Government, too.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to point out to the Senator from Nebraska where I believe the weakness of Dr. Garfield's position exists at the present time. The 14 per cent advance was based upon the difference between the high cost of living and the average wage of the miner, as I understand it. Upon the figures which were compiled and analyzed by Dr. Garfield he based his offer of increase in the present wage schedule. The weakness lies in the fact that the operators are tied up for two and a half years on that wage scale, although the cost of living probably will come down during that period, or we hope that it will. But the American public will continue to pay the burden of cost imposed at this time under that contract.

Mr. MYERS. I see the conclusion reached by the Senator from New Jersey, and undoubtedly it is correct; there can be no doubt about it. I am not undertaking to analyze Dr. Garfield's statement and offer which was accepted by the operators. I am merely saying that the Government having accepted it, and announced that it would stand on it, and put its authority back of it, the Government should not back down from its position and compromise. I believe it should stand on the position it has taken. I am opposed to any compromise of the controversy. The Government has declared that this is an unlawful strike; the Government can not take back that declaration; and I am opposed to compromise with lawlessness. If the Government is right, it should maintain its stand for the right. I want to see no compromise of this vital question, this momentous contest, which would compromise principle. Such compromises are always inadvisable and harmful.

The majesty and supremacy of the law are at stake. The test of governmental authority is at hand. The provisions of this bill which constitute the test are so plainly just, fair, equitable, and in accordance with democratic government, the rule of the majority, the common good, the general welfare, that I do not think a better test can ever be had than that here presented, a test from which I think no representative of the people should shrink. With provision for guaranteeing to railroad employees adequate wages and fair working conditions and enforcing them, and with provision for raising the revenue with which to defray the expense, something which the railroad employees have never had, I do not believe there can be any valid objection to a provision that two or more employees shall not conspire to interfere with interstate commerce or that others shall not incite, aid, abet, encourage, or advise them to do so.

That is the very foundation stone of just government. It is the embodiment of the principle of equal rights to all, special privileges to none, the general good of all. It does not mean that no railroad employee may quit his job. Under this proposed law any railroad employee not satisfied with the wages, conditions, or terms of his job or the character of his work could exercise the great American privilege of quitting his job and seeking employment elsewhere. That is a privilege which every employee should have. There is nothing in this bill to prevent it. It does provide, however, that under such conditions as are guaranteed railroad employees, conditions never before enjoyed by them, conditions not enjoyed by any other class of employees in this country, it shall not be in the power of anybody to precipitate suddenly upon the defenseless people of this country a nation-wide railroad strike, bringing utter paralysis of business and possibly starvation to millions of innocent men, women, and children. That is too much power to repose in anybody without some control and regulation by law. We know it, and the time has come to say so and to take action.

The time was when it was the privilege of employer to fix the wages and working conditions of employee, and if the employee did not like them he could quit. The modern tendency of organized labor is for the employees to fix their wages and working conditions and to make the employer grant them. Neither system is entirely just. The public has an interest and should be considered.

The time was when there was involuntary servitude, corporeal slavery, in this country and other parts of the world. The master was the owner. The worker was the slave. That time is passed. A new form of slavery, however, has grown up. The new theory is not that the master owns the worker but that the worker owns the job and that the employer is the employee's slave; that the employee has the right to fix his wages and conditions of work and that the employer must grant them whether he wants to do so or not, not that the employer owns the worker but that the worker is the owner of the job; that he has a life tenure to the job and that the employer must keep him in the job for life; that worker and job are not under any circumstances to be separated; that the employer dare not discharge the worker; that the job is a personal perquisite of the worker and that he may fix wages and conditions and they have to be granted. This form of slavery is quite as tyrannical as the old form of corporeal slavery and more detrimental to the general welfare. It is wholly unsound. Corporeal slavery, happily, having been abolished, the new form of industrial slavery should be abolished. The public has an interest and should have something to say. This bill undertakes to give the public its rights in the premises and to say neither employer nor employee shall be in slavery; that there shall be no slavery, but that there shall be fair and equal treatment of both employer and employee, and that if the employee does not like the terms of employment he can quit, but may not conspire to bring ruination upon all the people.

I do not believe that, as a class, railroad employees have unduly suffered from low wages. Since the outbreak in Europe of the European war all classes in this country, except the rich, have suffered more or less from the rising tide of high prices. Prior to that, though, I believe, railroad employees were fairly compensated as compared with other wageworkers. They did not have an opportunity to become rich; neither have the great majority of people in all vocations. I believe, though, that prior to that time a faithful railroad employee who stayed with his job and tried to rise on merit and who kept away from saloons and gaming tables and who lived economically and did not aspire to live in the same style as more fortunate people in higher positions of life, in the absence of prolonged sickness or other unusual calamity, could earn a good living for himself and family and pay for a home and in the course of time save a modest competency. I know some of them did so and in time accumulated quite a few thousands of dollars.

Since the outbreak of the European war railroad employees have, I think, been treated generously in the way of wage advances. Some of them may be entitled to more, under all of the circumstances, as they exist. I am sure there are some who are not. If not now, there may be some who should have more at some future time. To whatever extent any may be entitled thereto, within bounds of reason, I believe future advances should be granted, but I do not believe, in view of their ominous actions of the last few months, that railroad employees should be left with a club in their hands which is capable of demolishing the structure of Government and wrecking organized society and bringing death by starvation to millions if they do not get all they may think they should have, be they right or wrong. The great masses of the people have some rights.

Organized labor, with its operations conducted within the bounds of reason, has much of benefit in it for workers, but its power may be prostituted to the detriment of its own legitimate purposes as well as society at large. Some of its tendencies are harmful. Such should not be allowed unrestricted sway. One tendency of organized labor is to cause its members to be buoyed up together and to float together on a common level, regardless of merit, ability, industry, application, fidelity. It is destructive of initiative, self-reliance, all effort to succeed by merit. The individual is submerged in the class. He advances, recedes, or remains stationary as the class does. The frugal, sober, industrious, faithful have little, if any, more opportunity than those who are not so.

I know a young man, who is probably under 40 years of age, who holds a position as superintendent of telegraph of a short-line railroad. He gets a salary, I believe, of $3,000 per year. He does not belong and never has belonged to a union. He educated himself. He learned telegraphy in a country railway station. He took the first job he could get as a telegraph operator, at a country station, at a salary probably of about $50 per month. He has not worked up to his present position through the aid of a union, through striking or threatening to strike, through holding a club over anybody's head. He has advanced solely by merit, sobriety, industry, honesty, effort, application. I am sure there is yet higher promotion and greater success in store for him. He would never have attained his success by simply relying upon a union and blindly following some union leader, regardless of right or wrong, regardless of the welfare of the people; or by heckling his employers for higher wages and shorter work hours.

In Cooper County, Mo., the county in which I was born and grew to manhood, the original population was nearly altogether southern. However, in the decade preceding the Civil War and the decade following that war many people from the North and also from Germany settled in that county. They constituted a new element of population, strangers in a strange country, unaccustomed to the ways of the country. They nearly all came with little or no means. Almost invariably the newcomers hired out and procured employment upon farms or in trade. Wages were very low. However, the newcomers were almost invariably frugal, honest, faithful, industrious. They worked hard, early, and late. As a rule those who worked as laborers on farms, next rented, and then, in a few years, bought land. Those who secured employment in trade, in time opened shops, stores, or mills of their own. They prospered. Nearly all were successful.

These people, while working for wages, did not blindly follow and obey some dictatorial leader. They did not rely upon any union to buoy them up or carry them along. They did not strike. They did not spend their time in promoting discontent or complaining about conditions or bemoaning their fate. They did not evince any jealousy, envy, or hatred of their employers or of others around them, because their employers and others were better off, more fortunate, and had lands and wealth. They did not spend their time in persuading their fellow employees to demand shorter hours and higher wages. They were satisfied.

These people were or became good citizens. To-day their descendants—their children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren, and many of them are there—nearly all own fine farms or mills, factories, industries. They are farmers, merchants, bankers, manufacturers. Many of the finest farms of that county are owned by them. Many of them own thousands of broad, fertile acres. Nearly all are wealthy. Neither they nor their forefathers depended upon unions or legislation to give them success. They depended upon individual merit, frugality, honesty, industry, application.

One man whom I have in mind arrived in that county some years before the Civil War. He came as a young man. He was from New York, a stranger in the community. It is said he arrived with 50 cents, his sole capital, aside from honesty, integrity, industry, willingness to work, determination to succeed. I have heard that he hired out as a farm hand. I am sure he worked early and late and faithfully. He probably received as wages about $8 a month and his board—now less than a day's wage of many a workman. Doubtless he began work before daylight the most of the year. He doubtless began work at 4 o'clock in the morning and worked until after dark. He did not heckle his employer with frequent demands for shorter hours and higher wages. He was contented. He did not spend his time in persuading the other employees to demand shorter hours and higher wages and to quit work if the demand were not granted. He was so faithful he was made foreman. Then he rented land. His industry, fidelity, and honesty became so well known that he was elected sheriff of the county. He discharged with fidelity and honesty the duties of that office.

This gentleman became a landowner; then a banker. In time he became the president of the principal national bank of that whole section. He became a man of wealth, standing, prominence, influence. Everywhere he was respected. His family was one of the best and most esteemed in that whole county. This gentleman would not have attained his success had he looked to the State legislature or to Congress to put him on a level of opportunity with more fortunate men, had he spent his time in complaining about social injustice and economic wrongs, and busied himself about theories of equality of opportunity and equable distribution of the fruits of toil. He was neither a theorist nor a complainer. He believed man to be the architect of his own fortune. He relied upon his own strong arm, clear mind, and indomitable will; upon honesty, industry, fidelity, application, economy to carve his fortune. He was not afraid of work. He did not want a six-hour or eight-hour workday so he could spend the rest of his time in idleness. He worked hard. When young and middle-aged he doubtless worked from 12 to 16 hours a day. His hard work did not hurt him. It was good for him. He lived to a good old age.

Such is the spirit that subdued, conquered, builded the great West. That spirit transformed this entire country west of the Allegheny Mountains and made it what it is. It has builded civilization. It has made this country. Work is to-day the secret of success no less than ever—unstinted work. Work is good for mankind. Work in this period of reconstruction is needed more than ever before. This is no time for six-hour days and five-day weeks. Our forefathers were hardy, healthy, and successful, and they never thought of such things—neither desired them. We should get back to good old ideas of work, economy, frugality, saving. We need more application and less extravagance.

We need more production, and must have it if the cost of living is to be reduced. The modern tendency of the union is to restrict production and increase the cost of living. Unions are almost continually demanding higher wages and shorter work hours. They restrict rigidly the number of apprentices who may learn trades. All of this is unwholesome and in the end will lead to disaster for employer and employee.

The average union is not content with going on a strike, but by picketing, boycotting, and, too many times, by force and lawlessness it tries to prevent from working others who want to work. This is unjust to American citizenship. If a man wants to work, he should be allowed to work, if he and his employer can agree upon terms. The old adage of an honest day's work for a fair day's wage seems to be largely a thing of the past in these days. The disposition now seems to be to get everything possible and give as little as possible in return. This is not economically honest. Plunder the public seems to be the disposition of the times. Trusts and monopolies did it, and now labor unions seem to think it legitimate. It is time for the public to receive some protection.

A great deal of class hostility has been engendered by labor unions. There may be cause for some of it. I think, though, much of it is due to envy, jealousy, or hatred of those who are more fortunate. Many incidents confirm this belief. God did not intend that all men should have equal opportunity. All can not be employers. Some must be employees. All can not do brain work. Some must do manual work. All can not be wealthy. Some must possess less than others, and some even must be poor. Different opportunities are given to men. Sobriety, industry, honesty, fidelity, application count for much. Ability counts for much. Some men are given more ability than are others. Even if men had equal opportunity, and if all of this world's goods were evenly divided and equally distributed among men, in three months some men would be riding at the head of the procession in Pullman cars, others would be riding in automobiles, others would be riding in carriages, others would be riding in ox carts, others would be riding horseback, others would be walking at the end of the procession, and some would be sitting on the fence and looking at the procession go by and complaining because they were not at the head of it.

Men should be satisfied with the opportunities God has given them; contented with their lot in life and determined to make the most of it and to do the best they can, instead of feeling envy, jealousy, or hatred of those who are more fortunate or more able and who have more of this world's goods, more success, and easier times. Each should make the most of life in the lot God has given him. I think everyone should strive to rise in the world and to better his condition and to provide a competency, but he should not continually complain that somebody else is better off than he, has more income, and lives in a finer house, and engender a feeling of hatred toward those more fortunate or more successful and expect legislation to make all equal. I am a poor man. I look around me and see Senators who are wealthy, Senators who ride in automobiles, while I ride in street cars, but that is no reason why I should have any feeling of envy, jealousy, or hatred toward them. I see around me in this Chamber men who have more ability than I, men who have had greater opportunities than I have had, but that is no reason why I should seek legislation to put me on a level with them.

I know there is a modern belief among many that legislation should equalize what God has not equalized. I know there are some who believe that if, in a country town, there are a banker who lives in a house worth $10,000 and has an income of $10,000 a year and a day laborer who lives in a house worth $1,000 and has an income of $1,000 a year legislation should be enacted which would cause each to live in a house worth $5,500 and each to have an annual income of $5,500; but it can not be done. That belief is economically unsound. It disregards the laws of nature and of economics. It disregards supply and demand, ability, merit, opportunity. This world was not intended for a paradise of equality, and it will not be until the millennium.

Covetousness is an insidious sin. It is generally accompanied by a spirit of hostility. While this bill was under consideration in committee I received from a union of trainmen a resolution strongly opposing a proposal to allow railroad investors to earn 6 per cent per annum on their investment. It was not a resolution in favor of allowing liberal wages and good working conditions to workmen, but was in opposition to a 6 per cent return upon railroad investment. I do not believe that is the proper spirit to prevail between employee and employer. It is a spirit of hostility which does no good. I can see no reason why employees should begrudge employers a fair profit.

I also received a resolution of a cooks' and waiters' union, in opposition to the pending bill and in favor of continued Government operation of railroads. All hail to the people who know how best to conduct railroads, at last discovered! The cooks and waiters of the country! When in need of a railroad president, look among cooks and waiters! It seems to me if cooks and waiters would devote their efforts to qualifying themselves for promotion in their own vocation they would do better. It may be that cooks and waiters know how railroads should be operated, but I believe there are others who know better. The action of those cooks and waiters in hotels and restaurants is indicative of the modern tendency of labor unions to stand together and control everything.

In pointing out, as I have, some of the harmful tendencies of labor unions as now conducted, I would not be understood as being hostile to organized labor as such. Within their proper sphere and within proper bounds, labor unions may be useful institutions and serve a good purpose. I have voted for many measures for the benefit of labor. When organized labor, however, undertakes to defy the Government, to bring ruin upon the country and starvation to the people, to flout courts and engage in lawlessness; when it undertakes to set up an inner government superior to constitutional government; when it seeks special privileges as a favored class, I for one am ready to say, "So far and no farther shalt thou go." It is time for us to put our backs to the wall and say, "You shall not pass." I know organized labor vows vengeance against all in public life who oppose its demands, but there are worse things than to give one's political life for his country. There are worse things than to give one's physical life for his country.

Labor unions, like all other organizations of people, should be restrained by law from going to hurtful excesses; from contravening the general welfare. They should be amenable to reason and to law. They should be subverted to the popular will, the rule of the majority. Within proper bounds and the scope of reason, they will not find the public or Congress, which represents the public, or is supposed to, inimical.

However, if organized labor would retain the good will of the public and not incur the opposition of the Government, it must discard the leadership of radicals, reds, and syndicalists; it must quit holding a stop watch on the Government and saying, "Do as we say or take the consequences"; it must quit making outrageous, unreasonable, revolutionary demands and as an alternative threatening to ruin, wreck, starve, and freeze; it must abandon putting the inner government over constitutional government.

There is much evidence that the people are tiring of these excesses of organized labor. At last there is proof that the worm will turn when trod upon, for the Government has turned on the excesses of organized labor and asserted its authority.

Even Congress, which has long been submissive to the demands of organized labor, is beginning to show some sign of resentment. Upon the recent vote in the Senate upon a motion to strike from an appropriation bill a provision that none of the money appropriated should be used to prosecute farm or labor organizations for combinations in restraint of trade, contrary to the provisions of antitrust laws, the vote in favor of striking out such provision was the largest ever recorded in favor of such a motion in the Senate.

A few weeks ago, when extravagant demands of labor unions were being pressed to the utmost and dire threats were being made of the consequences if such demands were not granted, and when disaster seemed to be impending, there was suddenly sprung an effort to unionize the police forces of the country and have them affiliate with the American Federation of Labor. It was a movement fraught with much significance. It was plainly encouraged by the American Federation of Labor. Almost before it was known, the police forces of 37 cities had unionized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Included in the number was the police force of the District of Columbia. I was one of the first Senators to oppose such action by the police force of the District of Columbia. I introduced a resolution to forbid it. At first my resolution received scant support. Since then, however, my action has been vindicated. Lately Congress has enacted a law forbidding such affiliation by the police force of the District.

The American Federation of Labor has invaded the ranks of Federal employees, and now nearly all of the employees of the Federal Government, or at least a very large proportion of them, are organized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and are subject to calls for strike benefits for strikers who are trying to bring ruin to the country, some of them lawless and defying court injunctions of the Government. This is ominous and dangerous. Startling are some of the revelations made to me of the terrorizing tactics of unionized employees of the Government, of the fear to which Government employees are subjected, and of the methods used to control departments and their employees by union influences. They portray a bad state of affairs. Recently the Senate put into a bill and passed a provision forbidding Federal employees to affiliate with a higher body of organized labor, meaning the American Federation of Labor, but the House of Representatives rejected it and the provision was dropped in conference. These things, however, show that Congress is awakening to dangers that menace the country.

By advocating action by Congress to curb excessive and harmful acts of organized labor I would not have it understood that I am unmindful of or opposed to restraining action as to capital when needed. I believe capital, too, should be restrained from flagitious acts harmful to the public. Both labor and capital should be treated alike. Both should feel the restraining arm of the law when disposed to interfere with the general welfare and contravene the rights of the public. Neither should be above the law's restraint nor beneath its protection. Both should be subject to the law.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. DIAL. Does not the Senator think that it is time the legislatures of the various States should enact laws to cover some of the questions to which reference has been made by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MYERS. I do. I think in matters of interstate commerce and in the field of legislation belonging to Congress the National Legislature should set the example for the State legislatures.

Mr. DIAL. The State legislatures are soon to meet. The legislatures of most of the States meet on the 1st of January, I believe.

Mr. MYERS. I think it would be well for them to take cognizance of the tendencies of the times and of some of the dangers that beset us. Congress can not legislate on all subjects of legislation. Meantime, let Congress do its duty and set an example.

I believe in equality of treatment, so far as are concerned the Government and its citizens. I believe all should be treated with equal consideration and fairness. I believe every man should have a fair opportunity, so far as the Government is concerned or may provide, to earn an adequate living by honest work. I believe, so far as the Government may be able to provide, each of its citizens should be provided impartial opportunity to rise in the world and better his condition and provide for his family and, by industry, thrift, frugality, application, fidelity, to provide a competency. I believe merit should be allowed opportunity for recognition. I believe every legitimate incentive should be offered to merit, honesty, industry, effort. If a man may have the ability, coupled with honesty, industry, sobriety, application, I believe he should be afforded every legitimate opportunity to rise in the world, advance his position, and better his condition.

I believe every citizen should be accorded by the Government every privilege which may better his condition and make a better citizen of him, which does not conflict with the common good and the general welfare of the entire population. I do not believe, though, that any individual or any combination of individuals or any class of individuals should be granted privileges or concessions by legislation which, while they might please the recipients or even make them better off, would be a positive detriment and injustice to the great body of the populace, the general public. Such legislation would be unsound, unjust, unwise, undemocratic, un-American. There are people who contend that labor should be given all it asks and thereby, they say, remove the cause of its discontent and avoid trouble. Of course, if a man be discontented, because he wants your house and does not possess it, and threatens to put you out and take possession, one way to remove his discontent and avoid trouble would be to move out and give him possession; but I do not believe that method commends itself to right or reason.

We are told by some that the only way to remove discontent is to remove the cause of the discontent. The only way to do that would be to give everybody everything they want. That was tried in Russia. The only way to remove the discontent of radicals, reds, and anarchists would be to take a scoop shovel and shovel out to them all the money in the United States Treasury; and when they had spent all of it repeat the operation. Soft words will not satisfy these people.

I believe people should be encouraged to labor as much as is wholesome, and not to labor as little as possible. The constant tendency to shorten work hours is unwholesome and should be discouraged. Especially now, of all times for generations past, the world needs all the labor it can get. It needs all the production it can get. The world must be rehabilitated. The cost of living must be reduced. The high cost of living affects poor people more than anybody else. The rich can stand it. The poor can ill afford it. Every advance in the cost of living inflicts upon millions of toiling poor people a hard blow and gives them many pangs of anguish. Every restriction of production, every advance of wages, enhances the cost of living and hurts somebody.

I believe in these times people should labor to the extent of their ability and try to live within their incomes, and not be threatening dire disaster if they do not get what would be pleasing to them and all they would like to have. It is a time for patience, patriotism, prudence, fairness, impartiality. It is a time when greed and the grabbing spirit should be discouraged. It is a time when the general good of all should be paramount. It is a time when men should be taught to be satisfied to render an honest day's work for a fair day's wage. That would remedy much of our trouble. Work is good for man. He should realize that it is the divine decree that he shall live by labor. More men rust out than wear out. I sympathize with working people. I have been a hard worker all of my life, and with little more result than a comfortable living. I grew to manhood on a farm, where I knew hard manual labor. I have worked hard ever since, and I have sympathy with those who toil, but they should not ask for what is not in the interest of the common good, simply that they may particularly benefit therefrom.

I want the railroads of this country to be successfully conducted and, to a reasonable degree, to be prosperous. I want railroad investors to have a fair return on their investments. I want the public to have good service at reasonable rates. I want railroad employees to have adequate wages and fair working conditions. This bill, carefully framed by those who have made a deep study of the subject of railroad legislation, some of whom have given it much more labor and attention than I, is intended to produce those conditions, and I believe it calculated to produce them. I do not believe, though, it should leave in the hands of any of the parties interested power to wreck the country and bring misery to the public. None of the parties interested should want that power and, if they do want it, they should not have it. We are all partners in the operation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and we should all work for the common good, and none should seek his own good to the detriment of all others.

I believe this bill, if enacted into law, will be a blessing to the country. If enacted, I believe it will make railroad employees better off, more contented and satisfied, and give them a better opportunity and more equal justice than they have ever had in their lives. If enacted, I believe it will in a measure serve the ends of justice and promote the general welfare and will insure domestic tranquillity to an extent hitherto unknown in railroad circles. If enacted, I believe it will tend to abolish class hostility and friction and bring about an era of good feeling between the public, railroad investors, railroad employers, and railroad employees, and I believe it will save the country many anxious hours and avert a great, overshadowing menace.

This bill is not altogether as I would have it. It is not altogether as I strove for in committee. With some of its principles I do not agree. With some of its provisions I am not satisfied. In committee I voted against some of its provisions and voted for others which failed of adoption. I believe the return intended by it to be provided for investors upon their investments too small. There are other things in it which are not in accord with my views, but, upon the whole, I believe it meritorious. I believe there is much of good in it. I think it would work an improvement in railroad conditions.

The experience of the last two years has conclusively shown, I think, that Government operation of railroads is not a success and is not desirable. In two years the Government has been out of pocket the staggering sum of $1,250,000,000 for the operation of the roads, this in addition to all revenues derived from their operation. This money must be wrung from already overburdened taxpayers. The greater part of the time it has cost the Government a net loss of more than a million dollars a day to run the roads. At the same time wages have been increased, the number of employees to do the same amount of work has been enormously increased and freight and passenger rates have been greatly increased. For all of this the taxpayers must pay.

In view of this record I do not see how anybody can advocate further Government operation. If there be any reason to extend Government operation I fail to see it. It seems to me that those who have heretofore believed in Government ownership of railroads would be cured of their belief by this record. Our experience shows that private ownership and operation of public utilities is better and more to be desired. Hence, the necessity of legislation to return the roads to their owners, with proper safeguards and regulations.

I may support on the floor of the Senate some amendments to the bill. I may even offer some amendments to make it conform more nearly to my ideas of justice, and I think I shall. However, whether amended or not, I shall support it. Whether amended to suit my ideas or not, there is in it enough of good to command my support. I think it about the best that can be obtained and, amended or unamended, a vast deal better than restoring to their owners the roads without any safeguarding legislation, and vastly better than continued Government operation.

I am heartily in favor of the wage-fixing and antistrike provisions. I believe, if enacted, the measure will bring peace to the long-disturbed railroad industry and that it will benefit nobody more than railroad employees. "Let us have peace" applies to-day to industrial conditions in this country. This measure, if enacted, will make for it. I have tried to tell some plain truths to Congress and to the American people for the good of all concerned. My intent in doing so is good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is engaged just now in the Finance Committee, and I suggest that he be sent for, because I desire to go on with the bill as rapidly as possible. In the meanwhile, I can say all that I desire to say with regard to the amendment that has been proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

His amendment proposes to strike out section 10 of the bill. Section 10 is that section which first refers to the transportation board, and I understand it to be the purpose of the Senator from Kansas to test the question as to the creation of the transportation board. I only desire to suggest that, entirely aside from the merits of the proposition, I sincerely hope that the Senate will not mutilate the bill in that way. If the amendment should prevail, it would become necessary to re-form the entire measure. I do not say that the Senator's amendment attacks the principle of the bill, but it would so destroy the machinery through which the bill is to be administered that it would become entirely unworkable.

In this connection it ought to be remembered that the bill passed by the House, instead of creating a transportation board, enlarges the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and attempts in that way to make it possible to carry forward the regulation which is now in the statute and which is proposed in the bill of the House. In any event, the question is one which will be at issue between the House and the Senate, and I believe it ought at least to be settled in conference.

What I have said must not be understood as even intimating that I believe that the provisions of this bill are not as they should be. I am firmly persuaded that we ought to have a transportation board, as distinguished from the Interstate Commerce Commission. The time has come when the Interstate Commerce Commission must be largely occupied, and will be increasingly occupied, in what are known as quasi-judicial or semijudicial duties. It is a tremendous labor, vital to interstate commerce to perform in that respect, and it is in every way desirable to disassociate the purely administrative duties which fall upon a body engaged in administering the law which we have passed, and the law which I hope we will pass, from these judicial or semijudicial duties.

The question has received the earnest consideration of a great many public bodies, and I think it is the universal opinion among those who have given the subject matter study and great reflection that our system of regulation will be much improved by the substitution of a transportation board for the Interstate Commerce Commission in the respects which I have mentioned.

There was little difference of opinion exhibited in the long hearings which our committee held upon the matter, and that unanimity of judgment among the men who are best fitted to pass upon the subject influenced the committee, which, as I remember, voted unanimously in favor of a transportation board.

I do not care to discuss the matter at any very great length in the absence of the Senator from Kansas. I see no other way in which to proceed, unless someone desires to discuss the matter, than to ask a vote upon it. I am told that the Senator from Kansas is already on his way. And possibly some other member of the committee would desire to say a word about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to strike out section 7 of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that the Senator from Kansas has advised me individually that if his motion prevails he then intends to follow the subject by making proper motions to strike out all those parts of the bill which contain any reference to the transportation board. This is just the beginning of the subject in the bill, and therefore he has attacked this section in the first instance.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the amendment that I propose is to strike out section 7, and I want to ask the chairman to excuse me for not being here. I have been attending a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, and came over just as soon as I heard that the amendment had been reached.

I know that the vote on this amendment will, of course, settle the question as to the other boards and commissions. The position I take is this, that under the Senate bill, and the House bill, too, for that matter, entirely too many boards and commissions are provided for.

In the Senate bill there are three distinct boards. These boards, and especially the one provided for in section 7, are authorized to appoint secretaries and attorneys and have transferred to them some 10 or 12 agencies that are now performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The salaries of the members of the board provided in section 7 are $12,000 a year, and no doubt, if it goes through, there will be built up in Washington a board with more employees than are now engaged in the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commision, if enlarged, could do all this work, and do it better, more cheaply, and more satisfactorily to the people of the country than any new board possibly could. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been organized for many years. It has studied all these questions. There is not a question that will come up under this bill that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not understand. If a new board is created, it will have to go over the work that has been done by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

So far as the other boards are concerned—those to settle wage and labor conditions, and the regional board to settle disputes—they are composed of exactly the same number of men representing the employees as represent the railroads, and will not likely come any nearer reaching an agreement than a committee appointed under the practice which is followed at this time. There is equal representation on the board and there will likely be a deadlock. This would be the case when the committees appointed under the present plan would be unable to agree. It would be better, therefore, to leave the question of wages, wage conditions, and disputes to the Interstate Commerce Commission. But if in the judgment of the committee the Interstate Commerce Commission has so much work that it will be impossible for it to dispose of this additional work, then a new board should be created, composed of men of high standing, who are disinterested, and the dispute should go immediately from the first committees appointed to represent the employees and the railway men to this board, and not to an intermediate board, the members of one of which are paid $7,000 a year and one of them $5,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will permit me to suggest that if the board should increase the amount of compensation to be paid the employees, that would necessitate an advance in the rates to be imposed upon shippers?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Who is there who can better determine the burdens to which the public should be subjected than the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is entirely familiar with rates and with the shipping facilities and the industrial conditions of the United States, so far as a board of that character can be made acquainted with those matters?

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator for making that suggestion. I had intended to refer to it a little later.

Mr. KING. I am in agreement with the Senator in some of his observations; but upon this point and others I have not yet reached definite conclusions. The questions involved in this bill are so important, indeed, so stupendous, that it is impossible for a man to grasp all of its provisions who has not made a life study of it, as some of the Senators have. But I am inclined to support the Senator's view that it is not wise to create a transportation board, and that it is wiser to leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the functions that are devolved upon the transportation board. It would seem to be best to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the question of the wages to be paid to the employees; at least to confer upon it the final authority to act in the matter.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no question, as has been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], that the Interstate Commerce Commission is better equipped to settle this question than any new board could possibly be. And I believe, as I stated a moment ago, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the confidence of the people of this country. If it is not large enough, then it would be easier to enlarge the commission than to create a new board; and you are bound to have a conflict of jurisdiction with the two boards, which is unfortunate in any branch of the Government.

But there is another thing. One on the appropriation committees, in going over the bills, finds page after page referring to boards and commissions. A few years ago I asked the clerk of the Senate Committee on Appropriations to make me a list of the boards and commissions and the amount of money that had been paid. I have been looking for that list in the last two or three days, but have been unable to find it.

I am afraid to tell the Senate, without again looking over it, the amount of money that has been paid in salaries and for help every year to the boards and commissions. I stated to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that there had been in existence one board, up to about eight years ago, for 20 years, that I do not think two Members of Congress knew was in existence. Possibly the members of the Appropriations Committees knew, but others did not. That is a fair sample. These boards are not needed; they are largely filled up by men who are not acquainted with the subjects which the boards are supposed to handle, and I believe it is the duty of Congress to do away with as many of the boards and commissions as possible, retaining those that have the confidence of the public and are doing good service; but create no more unless it is known that they are absolutely needed.

I will say frankly to the Senator from Iowa that if I thought the creation of one board or five boards, or of all the boards mentioned, would settle the labor question, I would favor them. Committees of employees and committees appointed by the management of the railways have been settling questions of disputes for years. They have been doing it, and if they can not settle them that way, you are not going to settle them by simply creating one, two, three, four, five, six, or seven more boards and paying the members large salaries. I do hope that this amendment will prevail, and that section 7 will be stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Kansas is opposed to the entire bill or not. The amendment he has proposed could have no other effect than to destroy the entire bill. I assume, therefore, in rising to discuss it seriously it is his purpose to overturn what I called the other day the central point in the bill, and I hope that the Members of the Senate will accept it accordingly and vote as their judgments tell them to vote upon that proposition. From the speech which the Senator from Kansas made two days ago, I assumed that his objection to the board of transportation was largely an objection of expense; but I now take it that I was mistaken with regard to that. Section 10 of the bill provides that—

> Immediately after its organization, as aforesaid, the board shall prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railway properties of the United States into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems, according to the policy declared in the last preceding section.

I need not read more than that, because I commented somewhat fully on this part of the bill in my opening statement. It will be remarked that this amendment does not, therefore, relate to the organization of the board so much as it relates to the plan of the bill, and I assume that the Senator intends to controvert, as certainly he has a right to controvert, the general principle which is involved in section 10.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. May I state to the Senator that I covered Saturday the two objections that I had to the bill, and the question of combining the railroads I covered in that statement. I confined my remarks to-day more to the board, together with the authority it is given later to perform, which includes, among other things, as I stated a few moments ago, some 10 or 12 subjects that are now under the Interstate Commerce Commission, but are transferred to this board. Also it has jurisdiction to settle appeals from the other two labor boards that are created, as I understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now understand the Senator from Kansas. I misunderstood him entirely two days ago. I would just as soon have the test of the bill come now as at any other time, because, as I understand it, if the motion of the Senator from Kansas is sustained, the bill is defeated, and we will have no legislation probably at this session of Congress, because I can hardly conceive that if it is recommitted to the Interstate Commerce Committee that committee would be able to deal with it successfully for quite a time to come.

Mr. President, I do not regard the observations of the Senator from Kansas as in any degree just. There are certain things that the Government must do. Those things are growing in number with every day. Every appeal that is made to Congress for relief involves some additional function on the part of the Government. It is therefore, as it seems to me, quite aside from the merits of this proposal to suggest we have a great many commissions. Undoubtedly we have, and we may have some that ought not to exist; but the work of the Government must be done, and who will do it?

We can not pass a law that administers itself. The day is long gone by when we can simply commit to the courts the administration of the affairs of the United States. There was a time in the history of the country when we needed no commissions, when we needed no boards, when a law which Congress passed could be applied to the individual through the medium of the courts. In those times the remedy was sufficient, but in this complicated and intricate scheme of society into which we have now developed that procedure is impossible. It presents no remedy whatsoever for the ills which the people of the country suffer.

The same argument was made against the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the Senator from Kansas now makes against the transportation board. The debates of that time are full of objections to regulating or attempting to regulate the railways of the United States through the medium of an interstate-commerce commission. I assume that we will continue to hear these protests for all time to come.

All that I ask of the Senate is to consider whether this is a proper function of the Government, and if it is, what body can best perform it without regard to the number of useless commissions which may now be in existence. Let us survey the situation intelligently and then decide not by reason of the existence of useless commissions but whether this particular board ought to be created.

In considering the argument of the Senator from Kansas I reverse the order in which he took up the matter. He is very much opposed to the committee on wages and working conditions and the three regional boards of adjustment. If there is any one thing about which the people of this country should be concerned it is the settlement of disputes between employers and employees when the dispute concerns the very existence of society.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Have not the railroads and the men been able for about 50 years to settle all their disputes?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; they have not, as I remember the matter.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my recollection that they have always been able to do so with the exception of two or three occasions.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Kansas must remember that the real purpose of the bill is to forbid the strike. I do not know whether the Senator from Kansas is in favor of that policy or not. He has not mentioned that during the course of his remarks, and I have no right to infer what his position is with respect to it. But if we are to forbid the strike we must create a governmental tribunal, impartial and free, a tribunal that will adjudicate the merits of a dispute between the employer and the employee.

I should be the last man to advocate the prohibition of the right to combine for the purposes of influence with the employer if we do not at the same time provide a tribunal through which justice can be done to the employee. The whole plan of the bill, so far as that feature of it is concerned, is based upon the establishment of a court or a tribunal—I care not what it may be termed—that will do justice as between the employer and the employee. I am speaking now, of course, of the railway employer and the railway employee. That we must do if we are even to entertain the proposal to forbid the combination or the conspiracy which results in the common and simultaneous cessation of employment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I hope it will not interrupt the Senator. I substantially agree with the position, just stated by the Senator, that there must be some tribunal having authority to determine the question of wages, and so forth, but the point that occurred to me as I read the provisions of the bill was this:

This tribunal is made up of employees and railroad officials. The public does not seem to be concerned or considered. It occurred to me that the Government having taken such a firm grip upon the entire railroad situation, treating the railroads of the United States as if they came under the jurisdiction of the United States, and that some sort of strong control ought to be exercised, there ought to be some provision made for the public to be represented upon these tribunals. I was wondering if that matter received attention, and what reasons the committee had for not giving the public representation upon these tribunals.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nothing was more carefully considered in the committee than the very thought suggested by the Senator from Utah. The public is not only represented in this plan for the settlement of disputes, but the public has the last and final word with regard to the matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. As the Senator will remember, my suggestion is that the work of adjustment of salaries and wages, working hours, and labor conditions and the settlement of disputes should be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission after a failure to settle between the employees and the railroad companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am coming to that. That, of course, is simply varying the matter, and it does not, as I look at it, quite reach the point. I will continue my answer, however, to the Senator from Utah.

The transportation board is peculiarly a public tribunal. It represents the public. It represents no one else. It represents no class, but represents the organized Government, the public, the general good; and that is the reason why I am so insistent that it shall remain. The transportation board is the final arbiter. Even if there is absolute agreement between the members of the regional boards of adjustment and the members of the committee on wages and working conditions, nevertheless their judgment or their finding must be approved by the transportation board before it becomes effective.

I think the Senator from Kansas probably has not closely observed what has taken place within the last few years. It is of the highest importance that in the first instance these controversies shall be considered by tribunals upon which the two sides to the controversy are represented—that is, by a tribunal made up of the classes that represent both sides of the controversy. The history of the last few years has shown that in tribunals so made up, in the very great majority of instances—I think the exceptions are so rare that they become negligible—there has been absolute unanimity as between the members of the tribunal representing the railway union and the members of the committees representing the railway corporations, or in this instance the Railroad Administration.

Mr. CURTIS. That is my contention, and that is why I say that they ought to be left to settle these questions.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, as they are now made up they are not Government tribunals, except as they have been appointed, and they are appointed, by the Director General of Railroads. When these properties are returned to their owners those committees must disappear necessarily. They are a part of the organization at the present time, and the bill, so far as it is thought wise by the members of the committee, perpetuates the same general plan, which is impossible after the railways are returned to their owners.

Now, Mr. President, I have a word to say, and a word only, with regard to the place which the transportation board occupies in this plan.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds with that discussion may I ask him a question? Why did the committee transfer to this board so many activities that are now under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. We did it simply because we thought in that way the duties imposed could be more cheaply administered. The Senator from Kansas is a distinguished exponent of economy, and I will say to him that we did it because we believe that the duties allotted to them could be much more economically administered in the hands of the transportation board and much more effectively administered in the hands of that board. There is no sanctity about the Interstate Commerce Commission. I agree that it has or has had the confidence of the people, and I want it to continue to have the confidence of the people. It can not long have the confidence of the great general public, however, unless it can do its work with much more rapidity and much more promptly than it has done its work in former times. When it requires years to dispose of a rate controversy, as it has required in times past, the people will not be willing to suffer that delay very long. We have left with the Interstate Commerce Commission all that it can possibly do; we have left with it, in my judgment, more than it can do with promptitude.

We all realize that in the future the relations between the controlling or regulating board and the country must be more intimate and informal than they have been in the past. We must have a transportation board that can keep itself advised of the conditions of all the railways of the country, that can keep itself informed with regard to the necessities of every community in the land, and that can and will be inclined to take prompt action whenever the people in any part of the country are deprived of adequate facilities for transportation. We have had no such tribunal in the past. We may not have thought it necessary. We have charged the Interstate Commerce Commission with no such duties, and I do not think it would be wise to do so.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is in its essence a judicial tribunal, and it can not act in that summary way in which some board must act if the railroads of the country are compelled to do what they ought to do in furnishing transportation to all parts of the country.

Mr. CURTIS. If I may interrupt the Senator for just a moment, I desire to say that on Saturday I did not have the bill before me when I made my motion. I now see it is section 7 I desire to move to strike out instead of section 10. I was stating my motion from memory, and a fellow Senator has just called the matter to my attention. The argument, however, is just the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator desire to change his motion?

Mr. CURTIS. I repeat, it is section 7 of the bill which I desire to amend.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the Senator changing his amendment. What I am now saying would be applicable to an amendment of the kind now offered. Is it then understood that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to strike out section 7?

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to modify my amendment so as to make it apply to section 7 instead of section 10.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I am now saying will be strictly applicable to that amendment, which I sincerely hope will not be adopted.

We have reached the time in this country when the regulation of our railways must be more efficient than it has been in the past. We have suffered year after year from delinquencies in this respect. I am not accusing the Interstate Commerce Commission of a failure to do its duty, but we have not laid upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor can we properly lay upon that commission, the duties which are required of the transportation board in this bill. We want a Government tribunal which will know just what is being done in transportation in every part of the country. If a sidetrack is needed at one point, we want a board that can order it; if an extension is needed somewhere else, we want a board that has sufficient knowledge to determine whether or not it ought to be built; if there is a shortage of cars in one part of the country, we want a board which has kept itself so advised of the transportation situation that it can order the cars.

We have conferred upon this board the widest powers with regard to the disposition of the transportation facilities in the United States; and, after years of somewhat careful study of the subject, I say that it would be utterly impossible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to perform these duties.

It would not only be impossible, but it would be in the highest degree inappropriate, because the Interstate Commerce Commission must be the final judge of the revenues which these companies are entitled to receive. It acts after complaint; it acts upon hearing; it acts after evidence is introduced. It is in every way comparable with a judicial tribunal. The transportation board, on the other hand, is intended to act—if I may use the term, although I hesitate to use it—as a Government general manager of the railways of the country. I do not mean a general manager in the sense that it is to interfere with the ordinary movement of trains, but it is a general manager in the sense that it is watching for the public what should be added to our transportation facilities and opportunities as well.

I think the Senate would commit a grave error if it were to disintegrate this bill in the way suggested by the Senator from Kansas. I know that the House has not thought proper to provide for a transportation board; but I repeat what I said, I think before the Senator from Kansas came in, that every man, so far as I can remember, without exception, who has spoken before the committee upon the subject at all—I now refer to those who represent not the railway companies but the public in a qualified sense—has insisted that we organize a transportation board that would have in this broad way the supervision of the physical property—that is, the supervision of the physical operation—of the railroads, so that each could be made to conform to the law, and so that whatever was needed could be done with promptitude and the facilities be furnished that ought to be furnished.

If we commit this responsibility to the Interstate Commerce Commission we must simply divide the present commission into sections; everyone understands that; and there would be no more security to the public in making divisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission into sections of two or three or four than there is in creating the additional board. The truth is that we would shortly have to increase the Interstate Commerce Commission to 15 or 20, and they would operate not concurrently, not jointly, but would operate through sections or divisions. It has the right now, under a law which we passed, to operate through sections, and that movement would continue until we would have a great, unwieldy, inharmonious, disconnected body that would be, as it seems to me, far less efficient than the transportation board for which we have provided.

This bill provides that after the consolidation of the railways which is proposed is complete, then the number of the board is reduced to three automatically, and we would then have an Interstate Commerce Commission of nine members—and I think that might well be reduced to seven in the event this bill passes and these duties are assumed by the transportation board—and a transportation board of three members. I shall very much hope that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to strike out section 7.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I call for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harrison	Moses	Spencer
Beckham	Johnson, Calif.	Myers	Sutherland
Capper	Jones, Wash.	New	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Norris	Thomas
Colt	Kenyon	Nugent	Townsend

Elkins	La Follette	Ransdell	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Sheppard	Williams
Gay	Lodge	Shields
Hale	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Harding	McNary	Smoot

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent from the Senate and the city to-day by reason of the serious illness of his brother.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and his pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on the passage of the bill, since it has arrived at that stage, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the action by which the bill passed from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order. I have no doubt the Senator's motion will be in order later on, at some other stage; but the request of the Senator from Iowa was before the Senate, asking for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and I ask what conclusion was reached on that request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was not any, because the Chair did not count the hands that were up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Must not that request be disposed of prior to anything else?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask, then, that that be done.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. If this vote is reconsidered and the bill goes back to its original stage, would the action of the Senate with reference to ordering the yeas and nays any longer obtain?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate several years ago overruled the opinion of the Presiding Officer on that question, and held that it would stand for the final vote. It only means that when the vote is taken it will be by yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. I was not here when the Senate acted. Has the bill passed the third reading?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has, and is on its final passage.

Mr. LODGE. Then, of course, a motion to reconsider the vote by which it went into the Senate would not be in order. It would be necessary to reconsider the third reading.

Mr. LENROOT. I first move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed to a third reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending matter is the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill. Is it seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] moves to reconsider the vote whereby the bill passed to its third reading. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is this question subject to debate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows no reason why it is not subject to debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand, there are Senators here who desire to discuss this bill who have some further amendments, and the action was taken when there were very few Senators in the Chamber. It seems to me, in the interest of expedition and proper legislation, that this motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed to its third reading should be adopted. I think we will expedite business in that way, and certainly we will get a better feeling and a better understanding of the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not opposed the restoration of this bill to the point at which amendments can be made. It is true that there were few Senators here when the Senate acted. That, however, was not my fault. It has been known from the beginning that I intended that we should proceed as rapidly as possible toward the disposition of the bill, and it was not my place to sit here and object to the bill going forward to the stage which it has now reached, inasmuch as no one presented any amendment whatever to it.

I shall not object to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, which, as I understand, will put the bill in the Senate and open to amendment. I shall object, however, to any motion that will restore it to the Committee of the Whole. Amendments are in order in the Senate, just as they are in Committee of the Whole, and I do not care to retrace our steps further than is absolutely necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again and see if he can reach any conclusion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to reconsider the vote whereby the bill passed to a third reading.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the action by which the bill passed from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate, and upon that motion I desire to say this:

No more important piece of domestic legislation, probably, was ever presented to the Senate of the United States. There are some of us who desire to participate in the debate of this bill and to offer amendments to it. We had every reason to believe that when the Senate has occupied months and months of time upon bills of very much less importance than this there would be some opportunity, further than has yet been offered, for the debate of the bill and the consideration of amendments. It is well known that we had no opportunity during the last session of Congress, while the peace treaty was before us, to give consideration to the details of this bill, and we ought to have at least a fair opportunity, further than we have yet had, to consider the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is true that the Senate of the United States wasted a whole lot of time upon the treaty of peace. It is furthermore true that the Senate of the United States is in the habit of wasting a lot of time upon every subject which is presented for its consideration. It may be true that the Senate has wasted a lot of time upon this particular bill.

I am not one of those who have been constantly present and constantly seeking for an opportunity to amend this bill, but ever since this particular session of Congress met we have been considering this bill. There has been ample opportunity for every Senator to be present. Those Senators who were not present were not present because they voluntarily chose not to be present. This bill was brought before the Senate in the regular way, was considered in the regular way, and has reached its present stage in the regular way; and there is no excuse for any Senator, except his own neglect of duty—neglect of duty in the way of being absent, neglect of duty in the way of considering the evidence, neglect of duty in the way of being prepared with an amendment, whatever the neglect of duty may be—there is no excuse for any Senator, except a neglect of duty, in undertaking now, at the eleventh hour of the consideration of this bill, to start it all over again with an infinitude of senatorial talk about very nearly nothing. The bill has reached its present stage by regular course. Every Senator had a right to be present; but that was not all, every Senator had a duty to be present if he had an amendment to offer, and if the Senator from Wisconsin was not present it was his own fault. If I were not present, it would be my own fault.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin will say to the Senator from Mississippi that he has been much more regular in attendance on the sessions of the Senate than the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is a mere ad hominem observation, which carries no weight and no influence with it. The Senator may have been much more often present—and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, because his interruption was a bit personal—it may be true that the Senator from Wisconsin has been present more studiously than the Senator from Mississippi; but the Senator from Mississippi is not complaining of the fact that he was not present, and the Senator from Wisconsin is complaining of the fact that he has not been present. Whenever I choose to abstain from attendance upon the Senate, I choose to do it because I know that my presence is not absolutely necessary to the conduct of the public business at that particular moment. Whenever the Senator from Wisconsin chooses not to be present, he occupies an air to the effect that his presence was absolutely necessary to the conduct of the public business at that particular moment. There is a wide divergence.

Mr. President, taking my entire membership in this and the other House of Congress, I deny that the Senator from Wisconsin has been more studiously present than I. I have been present always whenever there was anything that I cared about interfering with, that I cared about amending, that I cared about inaugurating, that I cared about instituting or reinstituting. And I never have been known to plead the baby act.

But after the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives had been considering a bill this long, over a week—and a week is a long time; it is the fifty-second part of a year—I have never felt that I have a right to come in at the last moment and say, "Mr. President, have pity upon me, poor little me. There has been pending a bill for a week or more, and I have not had an opportunity to say my little say about it and offer my little amendments to it." Nobody has ever caught me in that sort of an attitude, and that is the attitude which the Senator from Wisconsin now occupies.

What is this great deliberative body, anyhow? Can it do anything except deliberate? If it can, nobody has found it out. This bill ought to have been disposed of in three or four days. There is not a Senator of average intelligence in this body—and I say "average intelligence," with the emphasis upon the "average," for the benefit of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has not read the bill, who did not know where he stood upon every phase of it, who was not ready to vote upon every clause of it, and who, if he had any amendments to offer, did not have his amendments ready, and if there be a Senator here who occupies a different attitude he ought to have stayed at home.

While the league of nations question was being presented at the last Congress the Senator from Wisconsin, I presume, was thinking on the side about this legislation; at least everybody fit to be a Senator of the United States was thinking about it, ready to take it up just as soon as the malicious and venomous attempt to defeat the peace of the world had succeeded. He knew beforehand his opinions on the subject, and was ready to advance them.

Now, for God's sake, Mr. President, whenever the Senate can get ahead and to a point where it can dispose of something—and that is but once in 10 years—let at least my voice be raised to let the game go on to its finish.

Every Senator here who knows anything about the present bill, whether he learned a little about it inside of the Senate from idle talk or whether he learned a good deal about it outside of the Senate from deep reflection, knows what he wants to do. We have reached the present parliamentary stage, and I for one do not want to go back to another parliamentary stage and begin it all over, with a chance that Senators may talk two weeks more, not with the object of enlightening one another, not with the object of enlightening the country, but with the object of getting certain verbalities into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber on committee business when the last vote was taken. I have been fairly regular in my attendance upon the sessions of the Senate, however, since this bill became the unfinished business. I heard the greater part of the presentation of the subject by the Senator having charge of the bill, feeling that it was one of the most tremendously important measures to come before us. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] spent the greater part of three days in his speech upon the bill. It was exhaustive, it was illuminating, it was well prepared, and whether his auditors agree with him or not they must certainly concede that he has given the subject the most intensive study and was thoroughly prepared to discuss all its features, and did discuss all its features when he presented it to our consideration.

I think I can say with propriety and within bounds that except immediately after roll calls scarcely 10 Senators remained, on the average, to listen to what I consider one of the most important and one of the most informing discourses that I have heard since I have been a Member of the Senate. I wondered that the attendance was so small, for certainly there is no man who belongs to this body who does not appreciate how vastly important this measure is.

I tried to listen to the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who followed the Senator from Iowa with a very full and equally important discussion of the measure from his standpoint. I was not able, on account of committee work, to avail myself of the opportunity to hear all that the Senator from Minnesota had to say; but I have read the portion which I did not hear, and I owe him a very considerable debt for the illuminating character of his speech. He has evidently given it the greatest thought, and his views concerning it, both as a whole and in detail, are invaluable to me in determining my course upon the measure.

This afternoon the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] addressed the Senate upon one feature of the bill for two hours—that is, on what is called the labor part, a very important portion of it—and during the Senator's discussion there were not to exceed six Senators upon the floor to listen to him at any one time. Yet his speech was one of absorbing interest. As a member of the committee he has also studied the proposition, and while the bill does not commend itself entirely to his approval, he nevertheless is sufficiently acquainted with it to give those who are not members of the committee a comprehensive idea of his point of view.

I have been amazed that a bill like this, dealing with the great transportation systems of the United States, involving not only hundreds of millions but literally billions of dollars and affecting the future industrial and economic and perhaps the social welfare of the entire country, should have received this discussion while the seats of Senators were practically vacant.

Under these circumstances I am not disposed to vote to carry the bill back to the Committee of the Whole, and particularly in view of the rules of the Senate, which permit amendments to be offered and discussed in the Senate. I have no doubt that a great many Senators were absent because of committee duties, and I have no doubt that many, knowing what the habits of the Senate for interminable debate have been, did not return to this session as early as they otherwise would have done. For my part I think that the progress which has been made on the bill constitutes a sort of landmark in senatorial work, and while I have no doubt that the bill could be improved by amendments, and certainly by discussion, I do not think the fault is either with the Senate or with the Senator having charge of the measure.

I recall that at the last session the Senator from Iowa notified this body on two occasions that just as soon as the treaty was disposed of he proposed to press the bill for consideration, and to keep it before the Senate constantly, if that were possible, until it was finally disposed of. There is a warning twice uttered. The Senator was justified in calling attention to the fact, for the reasons which I have stated. I think, therefore, that we should proceed from the stage which the bill has reached until it is finally disposed of.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose that I need not say a word further with regard to the importance of this subject. I have already exhausted all the adjectives I can command in order to impress the Senate with the importance of a speedy disposition of this measure.

Now, let us hear a little history about it. I think no one can accuse me of desiring to be unfair or desiring to prevent the latitude of debate which is necessary in order to fully explain the subject or to view it from every standpoint that any Senator can occupy. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said, I did my best at the last session to advise the Senate that at the earliest opportunity I would bring the bill up for consideration. In the closing hours of the last session it was made the unfinished business, and the calendar of the Senate notified every Senator of its position in the business of the body.

Last Tuesday, having allowed it to go over Monday in order to conform to what seemed to be the proprieties of the opening of the session, I called it up formally at 2 o'clock, and I discussed it for three days, viewing it from every possible standpoint and explaining as fully as I am capable of doing anything my understanding of the bill and what it provides for. It was with the greatest difficulty that a quorum was maintained or secured at any time. Senators appeared to have so little concern with the subject that it seemed well-nigh impossible to secure their attendance in the Senate long enough to answer a roll call. I did not complain of that. I went forward with my opening statement as well as I could without any considerable number of Senators being here.

On Friday morning a Senator came to me and indicated that he would not be able to begin his discussion of the subject until Monday. I felt then that there was great danger that the bill might come to a final disposition on Friday or Saturday. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] made his address when he did largely at my suggestion in order that there might be given the completest opportunity for anyone in the Senate or in the city of Washington to prepare amendments and to present them. To use a familiar expression, I "eased" the matter over Friday and Saturday with the suggestion that on Monday I expected the bill to go forward in the regular way.

We took it up to-day at 2 o'clock. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] made an address upon it, and as I remember there were about three Senators here most of the time listening to his address. Then came the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. He discussed it, and I did so with as much fullness as seemed to me to be necessary, and it was submitted to a vote and the amendment was rejected.

What was I to do? I could not rise and say that because Senators did not see fit to present amendments which they might desire to present I wanted a suspension of proceedings. I simply allowed the bill to go then according to parliamentary procedure, and it proceeded to the point at which it was actually submitted to a vote and was about to be voted upon, when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] raised the question of the absence of a quorum.

I did not oppose the motion of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that the action on the third reading of the bill should be reconsidered so that the bill might be in the Senate and open to amendment. It is now open to amendment. Any Senator can offer any amendment that he desires to present, and he can debate it at any length that he desires to debate it, but I am opposed to retracing our steps further than is necessary in order to give an opportunity to offer amendments and for debate.

With this short recitation of the history of the matter, I hope that the present motion of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will be defeated, and that we may go forward with the bill with such amendments as may be offered and with as much speed as is consistent with a full understanding of the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] primarily and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] incidentally are mistaken about one thing. A paucity of attendance in the Senate does not indicate a lack of interest in the subject matter nor a lack of knowledge about it. It generally indicates exactly the opposite.

When Senators have made up their minds about a bill and about its provisions, they stay in their offices and attend to their ordinary routine business which must be attended to or to their business downtown with the departments. When a question presents itself which is new to the average Senator, he attends, listens acutely to the discussions, and tries to make up his mind; but when a question presents itself like this one, concerning which he has long since made up his mind, he does not go any further than to read the RECORD. The Senator from Colorado seems to think that unless a Senator can hear a speech by some one, that he can not be informed. There are a few of us who can read better than we hear, and some few of those have read the speech or the several speeches, rather, on several days made by the Senator from Iowa, not with a view of getting any fresh information upon the subject matter which if they were men of every-day intelligence they already had, but with the view of seeking reinforcement of their present opinion or with the view of seeking reasons why they should oppose the present opinion of the chairman of the committee.

One of the heterodoxes of public life, it is true, is that a paucity of attendance in the Senate generally indicates a knowledge of the subject matter. The average Senator is not an ass. He wants information. If he has not got it already, he attends the Senate in order to get it. Upon this particular bill he already had it.

Every man in the Senate knows about the cardinal points of the bill. He knows whether he wants a league of peace amongst the industries of the Nation or not, or whether he desires to leave the question of transportation, upon which depends the milk of babes and the food of adults in the great cities of the United States, to depend upon strikes. He knows that already. If he does not know that, he is unworthy to sit here.

Knowing it already, he has no great ambition to attend the Senate day after day and hear men spout about it. Why should he? When a man is capable of thinking for himself and is acquainted with the subject matter, why should he neglect his correspondence and his departmental work to hear other men give their views upon a subject concerning which he has formed his opinion and formed it indisputably.

Mr. President, this is a wonderful body. Disraeli wrote his "Curiosities of Literature," but if anybody wants to write a book entitled "Curiosities of Legislation," he would write a history of the Senate of the United States during the last three years. "Curiosities of Legislation"—one Senator pretending like he has come into the Senate to hear another Senator talk about something that does not interest him and concerning which he has formed his own opinion; a man getting up in the Senate to talk not with the idea of informing the Senate and not with the idea of informing the country, but with the idea of semi-informing himself, is an actor in this drama book entitled "Curiosities of American Legislation."

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is entirely wrong when he thinks that the absence of Members from this Chamber indicates a lack of interest in the subject matter. It generally indicates that they have taken an interest in the subject matter and have already come to a conclusion. That is proven by the fact that whenever you get a bill up on a vive voce vote, with trick amendments offered every now and then, the Senate is full of its Members, because every Senator wants to be there on that particular question. He has not considered it; he wants to hear what is said about it.

But when you come to a great question that the country has considered, that capital and labor and the public have considered and concerning which they have come to a conclusion in the opinion of the individual Senator, then he does not want to waste his time hearing another Senator verbalize.

There is no question presented to the Senate since I have been here that has been more thoroughly considered than this one, by the Senators, by individuals, by the newspapers, by the laboring men, by the capitalists, by the consuming public; and I deny that we ought to go backward in order to enable somebody like the Senator from Wisconsin, who imagines he has neglected to say something that he thinks is of great importance, to get an opportunity to say it.

I have not uttered a word upon the bill; I am not uttering a word upon it now, much; but I deny that simply because I am not gifted with an acute sense of hearing, I can not read. I also deny that because I am satisfied with my own opinion concerning the subject matter, that it is absolutely necessary for me to listen to somebody else's verbalization of his opinion—and "verbalization" is about the right phrase for it.

I do not know what one day's session of the Senate costs. I have never counted it up. I do know the annual expenses of the Senate of the United States are three times those of the House of Lords of Great Britain. I once had occasion to count that up when I was chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I put it in the RECORD long ago.

Why should the people be taxed to hear just mere verbalogy? When a man is here ready to vote, and when there is no issue on the particular question of real substantial importance, every amendment that any Senator wants to propose can be proposed and can be voted upon, and every amendment, according to the sacred and divine rules of the Senate, can be discussed ad infinitum—a sacred and holy right which nobody in all the world outside of the Senate reverences, worships, or icons.

It is said, or it was said at one time—though it is old-fashioned theology now—that God made man in His image. Later on some skeptic said that man made God in his image. If the Senate has made a god in its image, it is a work of the word—verbalogy, verbalization, constant talking, and constant talking to people who do not want to hear it, and generally constant talking to people who doubtless know more about the subject matter than the man who is talking.

So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to going one step backward, not only with this question but with any other, after this august and utterly impotent body has reached a certain stage in its part of legislation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not know what are the plans of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]; whether he intends to press this question to-night or to move a recess.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no hesitation in telling the Senator from New Jersey what my plan is. If it is satisfactory to the Senate, as soon as the Senator from New Jersey shall have concluded his address I intend to move to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion now pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. I presume, however, that a motion to take a recess would be in order even though there be a motion pending.

STRIKE OF COAL MINERS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to speak on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that the vote whereby the Senate passed the pending bill from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate be reconsidered. Debate upon the advisability of that motion will undoubtedly delay the Senate for some time. The question I wish directly to bring before the Senate, however, in that connection is the proposed settlement of the coal strike which is now pending. In view of the lateness of the hour, I shall occupy the time of the Senate for only a few moments.

In view of the fact that it has fallen to my lot to study the coal situation, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce which has been investigating this question, I had intended to address the Senate at some length to-day, presenting certain facts which should be in its possession and the possession of the public. However, in view of the fact that we are assured that negotiations are now on foot which are likely to bring the strike to a speedy end, I shall defer the remarks I had intended to make to some future occasion; but I wish to make a general statement for the information of the Senate and the country as a whole.

The existing strike is contrary to solemnly executed contracts between officials representing the mine owners and the United Mine Workers.

It is contrary to the advice and warning of the President.

It was carried into effect on the threshold of winter, when, by the stoppage of production, our transportation systems and our industries are crippled and great suffering and probably death will be the lot of tens of thousands.

It was begun in spite of the fact that the miners have already been given during the war wage advances aggregating 58 per cent. It has been precipitated upon the country in spite of the fact that the miners are now the best-paid workers in the United States, their wages running from $1,300 to $4,000 a year and averaging over $1,500 according to official statistics. It has been conducted for over a month in defiance of governmental authority and the decree of the Federal courts.

Dr. Garfield offered the miners an advance of 14 per cent, which they refused. I do not think such an offer was justified. The miners are not entitled to it. It is true this increase is not to be directly chargeable against the public, but against the mine operators. In the final analysis, however, the public will pay.

If the operators are earning too much and the miners are earning enough, as I am sure they are, the public should get the benefit of this 14 per cent, through a reduction of the price of coal. Instead of making such a reduction to the consumers, either now or hereafter, it is proposed to tie up the coal industry to the payment of this increase for two or three years under the contract which will be entered into.

I am more than anxious to learn the terms of the "deal" which I understand has been made between officials of this administration and the United Mine Workers. I look upon it with dread and fear its consequences.

In a public statement issued October 26, 1919, President Wilson said:

> A strike under these circumstances is no. only unjustifiable, it is unlawful.

I agreed with him then and agree with him still. The strike was an "unlawful" act, and the continuance of the act was even worse—it was contempt of court and a revolutionary act of defiance.

If the representatives of the administration have entered into negotiations with these outlaws—for such are men guilty of "unlawful" acts—prior to their calling off this outrageous strike, then have they been guilty of a deplorable act, which will return to plague them in the months to come and which will be fraught with evil consequences to this country and its citizens.

There are two primary conclusions that I have reached. First, this strike is an unconscionable and brutal menace to the happiness, the comfort, yes, the lives, of hundreds of thousands of American citizens—men, women, and children—in no way a party to the existing controversy and in no manner responsible, not even in the slightest degree, for the conditions, actual or imaginary, which brought about this crisis. Thus the strike in this instance is an exhibition of inhuman selfishness which should awaken the indignation and arouse the antagonism of every right-thinking American citizen. Secondly, this strike, under the circumstances which characterized its inception and those attendant upon its subsequent conduct, has involved such an obvious rebellion against the law of the land and against the authority of the United States Government that we may well take pause to consider whether or not the seeds of revolution in this country have not only been planted but that the harvesting time is now at hand.

In many foreign lands to-day we see, as we have seen for some years, all the instincts of humanity and civilization ignored and trampled under foot, and the spirit of intolerable greed, of bestial selfishness, become the ruling passion among men, with all the finer emotions of life cast to the winds. Thus innocent men, women, and children have been made the plaything of malice, to be crumpled and crushed and tossed aside, as though made of some base material instead of in the likeness of God.

So, too, in many foreign lands we have the hydrahead of revolution uplifted and upon the right hand and the left law and order have been laughed to scorn, threats against the government have been uttered and conspiracies concocted, all aiming at the subversion of lawful authority and the rule of forces which are but the harbingers of chaos and anarchy.

In what respect is the situation in America to-day different?

In soviet Russia they shoot down men, women, and children in cold blood. In America they commit an act which, in the final analysis, if consummated, will freeze and starve to death thousands, yes, tens of thousands; and, of course, it will be the weaker ones, the women and children, who will suffer most.

Wherein, Mr. President, is the course of those strikers less heinous than that of their brother conspirators in Bolshevik Russia?

In this controversy the fundamental problem is not an economic one. It is not a question of wages or profits. The real issue presented involves a continuance of a government of law and order, the rule of the majority, the preservation of our cherished institutions, the protection of our homes and those dearer to us than life itself.

In the settlement of the matter we can not afford to compromise or temporize with outlaws. If any American official, high or low, shall, for personal or partisan advantage, engage in trafficking with the enemies of constitutional government, then shall his name be anathema through all the ages to come.

In all seriousness, Mr. President, we should ask ourselves: Are we becoming a Nation of outlaws? Is the day near at hand when our laws shall be flouted without let or hindrance? Shall the Constitution, so long held to be a sacred document and the protector of our liberties, be justly looked upon as a scrap of paper, to be derided and cast aside as a bauble not worth preserving? Are we in America on the threshold of an era when government shall be treated as an unwelcome thing, anarchy the only desirable state, and license the solitary rule of human conduct?

Never ended a great war so disastrously. Never before was a titanic struggle among men followed by such a state of world anarchy. Speaking in the Senate two years ago, September 3, 1917, I said:

> I am willing, Mr. President, to help make the world safe for democracy, but I am not willing to make it safe for socialism. Socialism is no more the twin brother of true democracy than is autocracy.

I say here and now that it behooves us to prove that the war was not a lamentable failure, that those who gave up their precious lives did not make the supreme sacrifice in vain; that the war did in truth "make the world safe for democracy."

We have by no means demonstrated this. It remains for those in authority to demonstrate it. It remains for the executive branch of the Government to demonstrate it. It remains for this Congress to demonstrate it. If we fail, through personal fear or personal ambition, in the performance of this solemn duty, then sad, indeed, will be the lot of America in the years to come, and wretched will be the legacy which we will leave to our children and our children's children.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator withhold that motion? I desire a brief executive session in order to dispose of some nominations. Then, of course, I shall be glad to have the motion made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 8, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, touch the spark of divinity which Thou hast woven into our being with a flame of sacred fire, which shall illumine our minds, clarify our hearts, and bring us into closer communion with Thee.

Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God—understand His purposes and be inspired to larger life, greater faithfulness and efficiency in the work He has given us to do.

There lies in the center of each man's heart,
A longing and love for the good and pure;
And if but an atom, or larger part,
I tell you this shall endure—endure—
After the body has gone to decay—
Yea, after the world has passed away.

And nothing that ever was born or evolved,
Nothing created by light or force,
But deep in its system there lies dissolved
A shining drop from the Great Love Source;
A shining drop that shall live for aye—
Though kingdoms may perish and stars decay.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 5, 1919, was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on January 5, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and subject to the right of way of conference reports and other privileged matters, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes, and that on the conclusion of my remarks the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] may speak for a like time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that on January 5, after the privileged business, he be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes, and that thereupon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] be allowed the same amount of time. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Maine upon what subject?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. January 5 is the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the constitution of the State of Maine, that marked the separation of that State from the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection as to that. Now, as to the other gentleman——

Mr. WHITE of Maine. He desires to speak on the same subject.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

STANDARD OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The SPEAKER. On Friday last, before the House adjourned, the bill before the House was H. R. 9755, relating to the standard of weights and measures. The previous question was ordered and the reading of the engrossed bill was demanded. Is that reading still desired?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. BLANTON demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 17.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] No quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 80, answered "present" 1, not voting 129, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STANDARD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia; to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia; and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8067, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia; to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia; and for other purposes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion, I would like to see if we can agree upon the time for general debate. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE] I believe is the ranking minority member of the committee present. I have had no requests for time on this side, but I think perhaps I ought to ask for 15 minutes in which to explain the bill. If that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Missouri, I will ask for one-half hour's general debate.

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. One-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE] and one-half by myself.

Mr. ROMJUE. I have had no requests for any time on this side thus far.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, some days ago the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] informed me that he had been giving some consideration to the form of the soviet government of Russia, and at some convenient time he desired to discuss that matter before the House for about 40 minutes. He suggested that he would be very glad to get in under general debate this morning; but, on taking up the matter with the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, he expressed a disinclination to have a considerable time for general debate on the bill, and I suggested to the gentleman from Idaho that it might be possible for him to secure unanimous consent to address the House this afternoon after the conclusion of this measure, if there shall be time, on the subject referred to; and if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will allow me at this time, I should like to submit a unanimous-consent request, pending his request, that the gentleman from Idaho may, after the passage of this bill this afternoon, should there be time, be given the opportunity to address the House for 40 minutes on the subject named.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will explain the government they have got over in Russia, I will have no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not talked with the gentleman in regard to his speech, but I imagine that he has given the matter careful consideration, and I have no doubt that what he will say will be interesting to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of this bill the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] may address the House for 40 minutes on the subject of the soviet government in Russia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if there is to be any public business transacted after we shall have finished this bill, H. R. 8067?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not anticipate that there would be time for any other public business after this bill is disposed of and the speech of the gentleman from Idaho has been made, if the House gives the gentleman the opportunity to make it.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Idaho proposes to speak this afternoon, will we sit later than 8 or 9 o'clock tonight? This bill is of 23 pages.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

STANDARD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to 30 minutes, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8067, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8067, a bill to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia; to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia; and for other purposes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object, Mr. Chairman. I think the bill should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created an executive department in the government of the District of Columbia which shall be known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. Such department shall be in charge of a superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, who shall be appointed by and be under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and shall receive a salary of $2,500 per annum. He shall have the custody and control of such standard weights and measures of the United States as are now or shall hereafter be provided by the District of Columbia, which shall be the only standards for weights and measures in said District.

The commissioners are also authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the superintendent, such assistants, inspectors, and other employees for which Congress may from time to time provide.

SEC. 2. That the superintendent shall, before entering upon the performance of his duties, give bond to the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, signed by two sureties or by a bonding company, to be approved by the commissioners, conditioned on the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond and oath shall be deposited with the commissioners.

SEC. 3. That the superintendent and, under his direction, his assistants and inspectors, shall have exclusive power to perform all the duties provided in this act. They shall, at least every six months, and oftener when the superintendent thinks proper, inspect, test, try, and ascertain whether or not they are correct, all weights, scales, beams, measures of every kind, instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring, and all tools, appliances, or accessories connected with any or all such instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring used or employed in the District of Columbia by any owner, agent, lessee, or employee in determining the weight, size, quantity, extent, area, or measurement of quantities, things, produce, or articles of any kind offered for transportation, sale, barter, exchange, hire, or award, or the weight of persons for a charge or compensation, and shall approve, seal, and stamp or mark, in the manner prescribed by the commissioners, such devices or appliances as conform to the standards kept in the office of the superintendent, and shall seize and destroy or mark, stamp, or tag with the word "condemned" such as do not conform to the standards, and shall also mark the date of such condemnation upon the same. Any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device of any kind which shall be found to be unsuitable for the purpose for which it is intended to be used or of defective construction or material shall be condemned. No person shall use or, having the same under his control, shall permit to be used for any of the purposes enumerated in this act any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device whatsoever unless the same has been approved in accordance with the provisions of this act within six months prior to such use.

Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved scale, weighing instrument, or nonportable measure or measuring device, subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act, shall notify the superintendent in writing at his office, giving a general description thereof, and the street and number or other location where same may be found, and it shall be the duty of the superintendent to cause the same to be inspected and tested within a reasonable time after receipt of such notice. Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved portable measure or measuring device subject to inspection or test shall cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection and test.

Every peddler, hawker, huckster, transient merchant, or other person with no fixed or established place of business shall, before using any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device for any of the purposes enumerated in this act, cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection and test semiannually, and shall not use for the purposes herein mentioned any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device which has not been approved within six months prior to the time of such use.

Nothing herein shall be construed to require the superintendent to test any weighing or measuring device belonging to the United States.

SEC. 4. That no person shall use or, having the same under his control, permit to be used, any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device, or any attachment or part thereof after the same has been altered or repaired without the same having been inspected and approved as provided herein after such alterations or repairs have been made, and no person shall alter, obliterate, detach, obscure, or conceal any condemnation seal, stamp, mark, tag, or label, attached or impressed by the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors, without written permission of the superintendent.

SEC. 5. That no person shall neglect, fail, or refuse to exhibit any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device, subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act, to the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors for the purpose of inspection and test, and no person shall in any manner obstruct, hinder, or molest the superintendent or any of his assistants, inspectors, or other employees in the performance of their duties.

SEC. 6. That the superintendent shall keep in his office a record of weighing and measuring devices inspected, which record shall show the type of device, the name and address of the owner, the date of inspection, and whether the same was approved or condemned. Such record shall be open to the public during regular office hours.

SEC. 7. That no person shall sell, offer for sale, keep, or expose for sale anywhere in the District of Columbia any commodity of any kind as a weight, measure, or numerical count greater than the actual or true weight, measure, or numerical count thereof, and no person shall take or attempt to take more than the actual and true weight, measure, or numerical count of any commodity, when, as buyer, he is permitted by the seller to determine the weight, measure, or numerical count thereof.

SEC. 8. That when any commodity is sold by weight it shall be net weight. When any commodity, except coal, is sold by the ton, it shall be understood to mean 2,000 pounds avoirdupois. Coal shall be sold by the long ton, consisting of 2,240 pounds avoirdupois.

SEC. 9. That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person. No such machine shall be maintained for use when the same is not in perfect working order, and the person in charge as well as the owner of such machine or device shall be held responsible for operating or maintaining any such machine or device which is not in perfect working order. A sign or placard shall be placed on every such machine or device in a conspicuous place and shall contain the name of the owner and of the person in charge of such machine or device, and shall state that the person in charge of such machine or device will refund to any person money deposited by him for which the commodity or service promised expressly or impliedly has not been received, and such person shall so refund such money.

SEC. 10. That every person, firm, or corporation shall, when a sales ticket is given with a purchase, cause such sales ticket to show the correct name and address of such person, firm, or corporation and the weight, measure, or numerical count, as the case may be, of each commodity sold to such purchaser, and every such person, firm, or corporation is hereby required to deliver such sales ticket to such purchaser when requested to do so by such purchaser at the time of the sale.

SEC. 11. That it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia any coal, charcoal, or coke in any other manner than by weight. No person shall deliver or attempt to deliver any coal, charcoal, or coke without accompanying same by delivery ticket and a duplicate thereof, the original of which shall be in ink or other indelible substance, on each of which shall be expressed distinctly in pounds, avoirdupois, the gross weight of the load, the tare of the delivery vehicle or receptacle, and the net weight of coal, charcoal, or coke contained in the vehicle or receptacle used in making delivery, with the name and address of the purchaser and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation from whom or which purchased. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors upon the person in charge of the vehicle of delivery, the original of these tickets shall be surrendered to the official making such demand. The duplicate ticket shall be delivered to the purchaser of said coal, charcoal, or coke, or to his agent or representative, at the time of delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors, or of the purchaser or intended purchaser, his agent or representative, the person delivering such coal, charcoal, or coke shall convey the same forthwith to some public scale, or to any legally approved private scale in the District of Columbia, the owner of which shall consent to its use, and shall permit the verifying of the weight, and after the delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke shall return forthwith with the wagon or other conveyance used to the same scale and permit to be verified the weight of the wagon or other conveyance: Provided, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in a quantity less than 280 pounds and is not weighed in a wagon, cart, or other vehicle, it shall be sufficient for the seller to deliver to the purchaser, his agent or representative, a ticket showing the name and address of the vendor, the name of the purchaser, and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke so sold or delivered: Provided further, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in packages of 50 pounds or less, it shall be sufficient to plainly mark each package with the name of the person, firm, or corporation making such package and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke contained therein.

No coal, charcoal, or coke shall be sold which contains at the time the weight is taken more water or other liquid substance than is due to the natural condition of the coal, charcoal, or coke.

Every vendor of coal, charcoal, or coke shall cause his name and address to be conspicuously displayed on both sides of every vehicle used by or for him for the sale or delivery of coal, charcoal, or coke.

SEC. 12. SEC. 34. That the act entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, as amended, is hereby repealed.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 17, line 14, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 16½. That no person shall sell, offer, or expose for sale in the District of Columbia any food in package form unless the quantity of contents is plainly and conspicuously marked on the outside of each package in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count. The commissioners are authorized to establish and allow reasonable variation, tolerances, and exemptions as to small packages."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to amend and to redraft the present law applying to the District of Columbia in relation to weights, measures, and markets. A bill very similar to the present one passed the last Congress. The law on this subject now in effect in the District was passed in 1895 and has proved quite insufficient to adequately prevent the short-weight and short-measure practices in the District. The District, in a great deal of its legislation, takes the lead over the States, but the law on this subject, so far as the District is concerned, is antiquated, and the District is behind a great many of the States in this class of legislation.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MAPES. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman say that the people who reside in the District of Columbia are now being treated to short measures and short weights, and that it is necessary to enact this legislation to correct that?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I did not say exactly that. But in some instances I think it is pretty generally known that that is the case. Of course, the District of Columbia is not different from any other community in that respect. There are some men who give full weight and full measure and there are some men who do not. There are instances in the District where it is known that short weights have been given.

One thing that the present bill proposes to do that is not done by the existing law is to standardize the measures used in the District. Under existing law there is nothing to prevent the use within the District of Columbia of any measure that human ingenuity can devise.

I have here a photograph showing a great many different containers that are in use. An examination of it will show how difficult it is for the unskilled eye to determine how much a container holds. There may be a variation of several quarts in containers that look very much alike, so much depends upon the size of the top or the size of the bottom of the container, or how far up the bottom extends, and several different things.

This bill proposes to standardize containers to be used in the District and to require the different dealers in commodities here to use the standards provided in the bill. Most of the States have legislation along this line, but unfortunately the District of Columbia has no adequate standardization law.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNBAR. On page 18 the bill specifies that a barrel of flour shall contain 196 pounds avoirdupois.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that is somewhat different from the bill which just passed the House, and when we reach that provision I expect to move to strike that language out of the bill.

The bill requires ice to be sold by weight. I think it is quite notorious that one of the great abuses in the District is in the selling of ice by a great many concerns that refuse to sell it by weight. They insist upon selling ice by the piece, and the housewife can take it or leave it, as she sees fit. Some of them refuse to deliver ice unless it is accepted in that way. This bill proposes to make it unlawful for any dealer to sell ice except by weight.

It also provides that when articles are sold by weight they shall be sold by the net weight, and that the wrapper, whether paper covering or box, the cost of which is very much less than the cost of the article, shall not be weighed and sold as a part of the article and at the same price.

The bill also requires the merchant, when he gives a sales slip showing the cost of an article, to put on the amount that is sold, not to do as a great many do, put down "Potatoes, $1," or "Meat, 75 cents," so that there is no way of telling whether the amount purchased is a bushel of potatoes or half a bushel, or 1 pound of meat or half a pound. The bill requires the merchant who delivers a sales slip to put on the amount as well as the price.

It also fixes the standard of a loaf of bread within the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do I understand that it is contemplated by the bill that on each sale, large or small, there shall be delivered to the customer a sales slip?

Mr. MAPES. No; the bill does not require that. It simply requires that in case a sales slip is delivered to the customer it shall contain the true weight or measure as well as the price.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is there any requirement that a sales slip shall be delivered?

Mr. MAPES. If the customer requests it, it shall be delivered, or if the merchant voluntarily delivers a sales slip he shall put on the slip the price and the amount of the article.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The purpose of this bill, of course, is to some extent——

Mr. MAPES. I have not time to argue the question, because I have only a few minutes, but that is the provision.

The bill also fixes the standard loaf of bread for the District of Columbia, fixes two standards, one of one-half pound and one of 1 pound.

It prohibits the use of baskets and other containers in place of the bushel and half-bushel measure. The practice at present is to use any sort of a container, any sort of a basket, which may in the course of time become very much out of shape and very much dilapidated. The bill proposes to prevent that.

The bill also extends the control of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets over automatic measuring pumps and the automatic vending devices on the street and the coin-in-the-slot machines. My information is that with these automatic pumps, as the quantity of gasoline becomes less the tendency is for the pump to show a larger amount than there really is. Under the present law the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets has no jurisdiction over and no way of correcting or testing these pumps. This bill gives him that authority.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I do not understand what the gentleman says about the measuring pumps making the measure greater than it really is. Does the gentleman refer to these gasoline-measuring pumps? Is that what he had in mind?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; my information is that as the quantity of gasoline decreases the tendency is for the pump to overmeasure.

Mr. GARD. When the gasoline in the supply tank gets low the action of the pump shows a greater amount with a low tank than with a full tank?

Mr. MAPES. That is my information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Section 1 provides that the commissioners are authorized to employ such assistants as Congress may provide. Is it anticipated that under this law there will be any considerable increase in the number of assistants?

Mr. MAPES. No; I will say to the gentleman that it is not. One feature of this bill which should be emphasized is the fact that it asks for no additional employees and for no increase of salary of the present employees. Section 1 is practically the same as in the existing law, with this exception: The existing law does provide for one inspector, but in practice that provision has been obsolete for a great many years, and the Appropriations Committee now appropriates for six inspectors, notwithstanding the existing law only authorizes one.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, with all these new restrictions that this bill calls for perhaps in time it would naturally demonstrate the necessity for a great many more inspectors and supervising inspectors?

Mr. MAPES. It might lead to that in time, although a great deal of this same work is now being done by the one superintendent and the present inspectors. The difficulty has been to enforce their regulations and to require men to give full weight and measure and to punish those who did not.

Mr. SNYDER. I have taken the pains to read this bill very carefully. It strikes me that it is going to put an additional burden on the people and an additional expense onto practically every item that a person must purchase in the city of Washington, in addition to the restrictions that we already have.

Mr. MAPES. I will say that most housewives would be willing to stand the little additional expense that the enforcement of this law will entail if they could be sure that they would get proper measurement and proper weight when making their purchases.

Mr. SNYDER. I am anxious that everybody should get proper weight and proper measure, but I am absolutely opposed to putting further restrictions, and therefore further burdens, on the people of this District or any other at the present time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I can not yield further. I have only a few minutes left. The bill provides that where articles are sold by numerical count the count shall be correct. It further provides that when anything is sold by the pound or the bushel that one-half that amount shall be sold for one-half the price of the pound or bushel unless the dealer expressly states to the contrary. For instance, if a bushel of potatoes sells for $2, and the dealer tells his customer that potatoes are $2 a bushel, and the customer orders half a bushel, the dealer must sell the half bushel for $1 or notify her at the time that the half bushel will be more than one-half the price of the bushel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to go over the bill in detail, but as it is taken up under the five-minute rule, if the Members desire it, I will be glad to explain the difference between the sections in the bill and the existing law. The bill on the whole is a redraft of the present law, making it more workable and putting more teeth into it, so that the superintendent of weights and measures can enforce the law and regulations and prevent short weights and short measures, which are now, as the gentleman from Ohio has intimated, practiced to some extent throughout the District. They are practiced particularly upon the people who do their ordering over the telephone. Under existing conditions, unless the people go to the markets and do their buying personally, go into the stores and see what they are getting, they are not sure of getting what they order, and in a great many cases they do not get what they thought they were going to get.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Reading the bill, it seems that the schedule of fees heretofore collected has been abolished. Did the committee intend to abolish the schedule of fees, and provide that hereafter the expense instead of coming on the dealer shall come out of the Treasury?

Mr. MAPES. The committee thought that for the dealer whose weights and measures were being inspected to pay the expense was a vicious practice and ought not to be continued, and the bill provides for the abolition of that practice.

Mr. TILSON. The salaries do not seem to be increased. Where is the compensation to come from if the salary is not increased and you make no provision for the collection of fees?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman may have a different view of it, but to me it is a vicious practice to have a man whose business is being inspected pay the inspector for the inspection.

Mr. TILSON. I do not dispute that; but how are the men going to receive anything more than the $2,500?

Mr. MAPES. They do not receive any more compensation. The bill does not change existing law in that respect, and does not provide that they shall receive any greater remuneration than they are now receiving.

Mr. TILSON. They receive only $2,500 and do not receive the fees?

Mr. MAPES. No.

Mr. TILSON. The fees now go into the revenues of the District?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. Mr. Chairman, as I said, as we proceed with the reading of the bill, I shall be glad to point out the differences between the different sections of the existing law and this bill, if the committee so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE] is recognized.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention briefly to one fundamental effect that the passage of this proposed legislation will have. Of course, it is not likely that even in the District of Columbia it will bring about those happy conditions which obtained in our boyhood, when one could go to market with a basket and a $1 bill and come back with the basket filled and change in one's pocket. To-day a man can go to the market with a $5 bill and he need take nothing but his vest pockets with him to bring home his purchases. The enactment of this bill is not going to take us to the Elysian fields or bring about a Utopia by rapidly reducing prices, but it seems to me there is one fundamental effect it will have which is desirable. It does not make much difference to the man who receives a large salary or to the man who derives a large income from his business whether or not the price of coal by the ton advances $1 or $2, but it is a matter of serious importance to the poor fellow, who buys his coal, so to speak, by the nugget rather than by the ton, to know that he will pay no more than a proportionate and corresponding price for the little bucketful that he buys from the huckster. This bill, it seems to me, in its fundamental purpose is praiseworthy because it seeks to protect the poor of the District of Columbia, who necessarily must buy in small quantities and buy frequently as the daily or weekly or monthly wage comes to the family.

It was very interesting to me and very surprising also to note the difference in some of the containers which were presented before the committee during the hearings upon this bill by the superintendent for the District, and even the members of that committee, somewhat skilled perhaps in buying different commodities in different quantities, were deceived by the quantities which those measures really held.

The visual conclusion is often very erroneous. It seems to me, therefore, that these people who may be readily deceived visually, the poor people of the District, are entitled to the protection which a law of this kind will throw around them. Profiteering is necessarily magnified many times when a ton of coal, for instance, is peddled out in erroneous containers and through spurious weights and measures to the poor people of the District; and although the bill may need amendment—and I can see readily that, in view of the bill which we passed this morning, an amendment should be adopted in respect to the number of pounds in a standard barrel of flour, this bill fixing 196 pounds and the bill which we have just passed fixing 200 pounds—although it may need some amendment, I say the fundamental principle should be borne in mind that the purpose of the bill is to relieve the poor people, who are suffering most from profiteering, and to afford a remedy in those cases in which the establishment of such standards will do so. This bill has to do with the sale of ice, coal, oysters, fruits, vegetables, and so forth, the things that go into the homes of the humble of the District of Columbia, and it should be remembered that those who need protection are the ones sought to be protected by the proposed law.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much impressed by the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and by the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] in respect to the necessity arising from the conditions which they describe. I want to ask this question of the Committee on the District of Columbia: Is there not some way, while we are regulating weights and measures and other things in the District of Columbia, to regulate the street-car service of the city of Washington for the benefit of unfortunate Members of Congress who have not an automobile and who live some distance from the Capitol? Can not the District of Columbia give the Members of the House and the public some assurance that this continuous performance of inefficiency on the street cars of Washington will at some time cease?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman that, lamentable as the conditions may be in that respect, that would come under long waits rather than standard weights.

Mr. BEE. There is a good deal of long wait about it, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further in that respect?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. GARD. In respect to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE], does not his colleague know that the Public Utilities Commission increased the price of fares 2 cents, which one company did not want and which the other company says is not sufficient to take care of its needs, and that notwithstanding that we have to pay 7 cents to ride a couple of blocks in the District of Columbia, with a very inferior service, notably on one line of street cars?——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, if I have any more time I yield the gentleman such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes more.

Mr. ROMJUE. Then I yield the gentleman from Texas two minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I was just interrogating the gentleman in respect to the question regarding street cars raised by his colleague [Mr. BEE].

Mr. LANHAM. I would state in reply to the gentleman that if by any of the measurements prescribed in this bill that matter can properly be determined, then we have endeavored to set a proper standard.

Mr. GARD. Under this bill what is the standard wait for passengers on the Washington Railway & Electric Co.?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not think there is any standard wait.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman will permit, I would say that 30 minutes seems to be the standard, and I would suggest further that if the Public Utilities Commission further raises prices the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and other gentlemen in the House are going to establish a reputation as long-distance pedestrians.

Mr. LANHAM. Well, there is getting to be some prestige in being a pedestrian.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I just desire to say in connection with what the gentlemen have just been discussing that I have recently introduced a bill which I think will regulate the street-car rates in the city of Washington, and if the three gentlemen will vote with me as enthusiastically as they have talked in the last few minutes I believe we will be able to bring about the passage of it soon. Hearings on the bill are to begin within about 10 days. I do not desire to use any further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created an executive department in the government of the District of Columbia which shall be known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. Such department shall be in charge of a superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, who shall be appointed by and be under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall receive a salary of $2,500 per annum. He shall have the custody and control of such standard weights and measures of the United States as are now or shall hereafter be provided by the District of Columbia, which shall be the only standards for weights and measures in said District.

The commissioners are also authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the superintendent, such assistants, inspectors, and other employees for which Congress may, from time to time, provide.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have been investigating this bill, H. R. 8067, and have been considering it in reference to the provisions of the old bill, approved March 2, 1895, and I wish to ask those in charge of the bill whether there is any disposition to add an increased force in the office of the division of the executive department known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. I do this because the law of 1895 provided that this officer should be known as the sealer of weights and measures and should receive a salary of $2,500 per annum. I note that is the same salary that is carried in this bill, and that which is new in the bill before us is the provision that the commissioners are also authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the superintendent, such assistants, inspectors, and other employees for which Congress may from time to time provide. Now, I do not know whether the present superintendent of weights and measures has appeared before the Commission on the Reclassification of Salaries, which we are constantly advised in the prints is sitting in Washington, for an increase in compensation, and I would appreciate the information from members of the committee as to how many present assistants there are in the office of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, and what the plan is for the increase of assistants, inspectors, and other employees under the new matter contained in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 of this bill on page 2.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, as I said in my opening statement, that it is not the intent of this law to increase the number of assistants at all. The existing law, the law of 1895, that provides for one inspector, has in practice been a dead letter for a great number of years. There are now six assistant inspectors. They are provided for in the annual appropriation bill, and the appropriation for this department in the current appropriation law is something over $21,000. It is perfectly apparent that the superintendent and one assistant could not properly perform the duties which the sealer of weights, measures, and markets ought to perform here in the District. This bill does not purport to change the existing number, although it does not contain that provision which has been a dead letter for a great many years.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then are we to understand that the law under which the sealer of weights and measures has been appointed and acted is still in force and there shall continue to be a sealer of weights and measures and also a head of this department of weights, measures, and markets?

Mr. MAPES. No; the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets is one official, and then he has some assistants.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, is the sealer of weights and measures to continue in office?

Mr. MAPES. The superintendent of weights, measures, and markets is the correct designation. He used to be called the "sealer of weights and measures," but in 1910, by the passage of a very short law, the title of the office was changed to that of superintendent of weights, measures, and markets.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then will he continue in office after the passage of this law and the appointment of this——

Mr. MAPES. No; that law is repealed in the last sections of this bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then there is to be only one of these gentlemen in this office performing this duty?

Mr. MAPES. That is all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. MAPES. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut desires to ask a question?

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask about the necessity for the creation of a new department known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. Heretofore there was a sealer of weights and measures retained under the commissioners. In this bill we provide a new department, which sounds rather large. I do not know what the importance of it may be that makes it necessary.

Mr. MAPES. The appointment is made in the same way by the commissioners. I imagine the change would be more nominal than anything else.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama desires to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit this inquiry: I notice sections 30 and 31 of the bill are matters of definition. It seems to me it would be more appropriate, as a matter of ordinary construction of legislation of this sort, to have had those sections, instead of being put in the back of the bill, come after section 1 of the bill; and I desire to ask if it would be in order to move or offer an amendment transposing those two sections and number them properly, so that they would follow immediately after the present text of section 1 of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question that will properly arise when those sections are reached in the consideration of the bill for amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to know if it can not be raised now?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent, by advancing to that portion of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I simply desired to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it. It seems to me, in view of the subject matter of those two sections, they should properly be in the first part of the bill, and when it is reached it seems to me it ought to be transposed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, mention was made a moment ago of the 7-cent fare which is charged on the street car lines in Washington. I am not at all surprised that we are paying 7 cents for passage on street cars here, because since last April, nine long months, the Washington Electric Street Railway Co. has been repairing its track on one short street here in this city—East Capitol Street—which faces the main east entrance of this building. They have had that track torn up for nine long months—since April. They have had at work there during that time—because I have seen them every day except a few days when there was bad weather and when they could not work—all the way from twenty-five to over a hundred workmen; and if every man in this House or in this city could have just gone up there day after day and watched that bunch of men fool away time they would not be surprised at 7-cent fares.

Out of the biggest number they ever had at work there at any one time, there was about the same percentage at work as there is a percentage of the Members of this House at work right now on the floor of this House. We have here on the floor 24 men, embracing the distinguished Republican leader from Illinois [Mr. MANN], whose presence here, I am sure, we are all glad of at this time. Out of 435 men, we have 24 Members here at work now on legislation, when the House on this, the Republican, side have been telling the people all over the country that they are much concerned about the affairs of the country. Are they concerned? Just so is the concern of the employees of this street railway company, and if the officials of that company, if the manager of that company, if the superintendent of it, would see to it that it gets proper service from its employees who are drawing money from the company, which many people of this city have to make good in 7-cent fares and in increases of fares, if they would see to it that the men who are working for them give a good honest day's work, and not fritter away their time in idleness, we would not have to pay 7-cent fares. They could cut the fare, if they would make all those men work, down below 5 cents and still make money. Any efficient street-railway contractor, with this big force of men, should have been able to have built twenty times as much new trackage as this company has been trying to repair on East Capitol Street during the last nine months. If all of its trackage has cost as much in repair as this small East Capitol Street sector, I am not surprised that this company must require a 7-cent fare to do business.

Mr. GARD. Has the gentleman read the bill with reference to the amount of water that may be in a package of shucked oysters, and does he know the amount of water there is in the stock of any of the street-railway companies here?

Mr. BLANTON. If there is half as much water in their stock as there is inactivity in their workmen, there is a plenty.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAYTON. The point of order is that the gentleman is not discussing this bill, as I understand it, and I am trying to save the time of the 25 Members who are here at work.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any provision in this bill—I have read it as carefully as I could and I fail to find it—concerning a place—a room or rooms—where this division or department of weights and measures and markets may be carried on? The old law contained, in section 3, a provision that the commissioners should provide for the use of the sealer and his assistant, and so forth, a suitable room or rooms to be used for the business, and the commissioners should provide a horse and wagon for the use of the sealer and assistant sealer at such time as the business of their office should require. Now, it must be manifest that this department of weights, measures, and markets must have a place in which to carry on its business for two reasons—one that the public may know and the other that the business may be properly transacted. Now, there is no provision in the bill H. R. 8067, as I have read it, which provides that there shall be any recognized place for this division or department of weights, measures, and markets, nor is there any corresponding authority for the provision of a horse and wagon, or, as I suspect will be necessary to-day, an automobile, for the use of those that carry on this work. I call the attention of the chairman and the members of the committee to this apparent omission in order to learn if there is a desire to amend the bill to incorporate anything of this kind.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that that omission was intentional. The sealer of weights and measures thought it was unnecessary to carry that in the bill, and he assumed that his office would be in the District Building, the same as other employees of the District are in that building.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that the bill should carry a designation as to where the office of this department of weights, measures, and markets should be, at least for the purpose of information? Should there not be some definite authority as to where he is and some definite authority for the provision of room, or of such transportation as is necessary for the business of the office?

Mr. MAPES. Personally I do not think it makes any difference. The sealer of weights and measures thought it was unnecessary.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But the gentleman will notice that the office of the sealer of weights and measures is abolished, or will be if this act is passed, and he will no longer be in existence. What weight will his opinion of how and where the business is to be transacted have? I do not know that it is important that the bill should designate a place or that a place should be provided, but when the gentleman from Michigan says that the omission was on the expression of opinion of the sealer of weights and measures, he is the man who is abolished, and the place is abolished. He will not be here.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, for the sake of my technical colleague from Michigan, I will say that my description was not entirely accurate. The superintendent of weights, measures, and markets is often referred to as the "sealer of weights and measures"; but, in fact, there is no such officer as the sealer of weights and measures and no such office. It is the "superintendent of weights, measures, and markets," and whenever the chairman of the District Committee speaks of the sealer of weights and measures he means the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets. It is the old law relative to the sealer of weights and measures that this bill proposes to repeal. But it does not do away with the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets. This bill proposes to give him additional power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last four words.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the announcement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that there are only 24 Members here. I have read this bill through now. It is all right, so far as I can see, and I expect to vote for it.

I like the committee amendment, too, on page 17. If there is any necessity for me to vote on that, I will. That leaves me free to go away, and in a moment there will be only 23 here. Instead of sitting around and pestering the committee with points of order and advice about something that I do not know as much about as the members of the committee do, I shall go over to my office and attend to business there for awhile. The committee has studied the bill carefully, I hope. I could sit here and ask questions and make speeches, but instead of that I am going back to my office, and I am going to work. I have another bill before another committee that I think is more important than this, and for several days I have not had time to get at it. I thank the committee for getting the bill out in this way so that I can get back to my business. I have a lot of letters that I have to write to my constituents, people who need attention—business in the departments—and I can not get time to do it except when some bill like this is called up from a committee in which I have confidence and which commends itself to me when I have read it.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. LITTLE. I thank the committee for giving me this opportunity; and aside from that I want to say about the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], now that I see he is on his feet, that he is quite right about the street railroads. Whether there is any other omission from the bill, there ought to be some way of getting at the railroads. What the gentleman says is all right. I would like the committee to tell us, some time during the consideration of some bill concerning the District, whether a Congressman has any rights in this town anywhere, on the street cars or anywhere else. I know of a Congressman who passed through the hands of three physicians in this town. One of them sent him a bill for $25 for an operation, and——

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is he still here? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. But there was no operation performed in that case. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] is lucky. He came safely through an operation here. Though there was no operation, this gentleman was charged $25 for an imaginary one. This Congressman asked that doctor if there had been any operation, and he answered, "No, there was no operation; but I always send in a bill for $25 in such a case, anyway." The gentleman paid a good-sized bill and the $25 more rather than go to law. This Congressman was sent to the hospital and was put in charge of a hospital doctor, and one day another doctor came in with a nurse, and he said, "Who are you?" The doctor said, "I am the doctor." The victim supposed he was the physician in charge in the hospital, but it turned out that he was just "snitching" a case. When the sick man went away from the hospital the other fellow turned up with a bill for $25. Rather than go through the trouble of a lawsuit, he paid that bill. He afterwards made inquiry of the authorities who have charge of such things. He said, "There is a law in this District that provides that for unprofessional or dishonorable conduct a doctor can be made to lose his license. Is it unprofessional or dishonorable to snitch a case and lie about it, and pretend that you are an official hospital physician when you are not, and send a man a bill for $25 for services never performed? Is there any law against that? Is it unprofessional or dishonorable in Washington for a doctor to charge for an operation he never performed or to snitch a case in a public hospital?" And the man answered, "No; there is not. The courts have decided that the law to take away a doctor's license in Washington for unprofessional or dishonorable conduct is unconstitutional."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Now that the efficient gentleman from Kansas has shown that he is one of the 24 men present, I would like to suggest to him that where we Members of Congress are not familiar with the provisions of the bill, by staying here and listening to the discussion of it we can gain some knowledge of it by absorption.

Mr. LITTLE. That is quite true. Most of the legislation is of such a character that it should have the careful consideration of all till it is completed. But here is a District of Columbia bill, purely local in its force. My constituents have about the same interest in it they have in the city ordinances of Chicago. Then, department needs, and the general legislation of the Nation now before committees of which I am a member, is vastly more needful of my time than this bill. Gentlemen who are on the committee, gentlemen who have time to spare are giving this their attention, and I shall keep in touch with the progress of this bill and be ready to vote on all important phases of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. All time has expired on the pending amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. I will say good-by now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BEE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. Just for one moment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MAPES. I will withdraw the motion if the gentleman has germane amendments. The gentleman from Ohio has had the floor twice on this section. I hope the gentleman will not bring in a lot of immaterial and irrelevant matters. This is an important bill. I know the provocation on the part of Members of Congress is great for calling attention to abuses here in the District, but here we have an opportunity this afternoon to remedy some of the principal abuses.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. Let us not by discussing irrelevant matters delay the passage of the bill, which is material and important. I will withdraw the motion, if the gentleman has a germane amendment.

Mr. BEE. I will not offer mine.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend, on page 2, line 9, after the word "provide," by inserting the following:

The said commissioners shall provide for use of the department of weights and measures and markets——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio send his amendment to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. GARD. I think I can state it so it can be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments must be reduced to writing and sent to the Clerk's desk and read. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Did the Chair indicate a moment ago that I must present my amendment in writing before it can be considered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requested the gentleman to reduce it to writing.

Mr. GARD. I am offering what I think is a pertinent amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is simply announcing the rule of the House. The gentleman can govern himself accordingly. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the superintendent and, under his direction, his assistants and inspectors, shall have exclusive power to perform all the duties provided in this act. They shall, at least every six months, and oftener when the superintendent thinks proper, inspect, test, try, and ascertain whether or not they are correct, all weights, scales, beams, measures of every kind, instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring, and all tools, appliances, or accessories connected with any or all such instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring used or employed in the District of Columbia by any owner, agent, lessee, or employee in determining the weight, size, quantity, extent, area, or measurement of quantities, things, produce, or articles of any kind offered for transportation, sale, barter, exchange, hire, or award, or the weight of persons for a charge or compensation, and shall approve, seal, and stamp or mark, in the manner prescribed by the commissioners, such devices or appliances as conform to the standards kept in the office of the superintendent, and shall seize and destroy or mark, stamp, or tag with the word "condemned" such as do not conform to the standards, and shall also mark the date of such condemnation upon the same. Any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing, or measuring device of any kind which shall be found to be unsuitable for the purpose for which it is intended to be used or of defective construction or material shall be condemned. No person shall use or, having the same under his control, shall permit to be used for any of the purposes enumerated in this act any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing, or measuring device whatsoever unless the same has been approved in accordance with the provisions of this act within six months prior to such use.

Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved scale, weighing instrument, or nonportable measure or measuring device, subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act, shall notify the superintendent in writing at his office, giving a general description thereof, and the street and number or other location where same may be found, and it shall be the duty of the superintendent to cause the same to be inspected and tested within a reasonable time after receipt of such notice. Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved portable measure or measuring device subject to inspection or test shall cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection and test.

Every peddler, hawker, huckster, transient merchant, or other person with no fixed or established place of business shall, before using any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device for any of the purposes enumerated in this act, cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection and test semiannually, and shall not use for the purposes herein mentioned any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device which has not been approved within six months prior to the time of such use.

Nothing herein shall be construed to require the superintendent to test any weighing or measuring device belonging to the United States.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 3, after line 25, strike out the period, insert a comma and the following: "Or that does not conform to the standard kept in the office of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, or which having been condemned has not thereafter been approved as provided in this act.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the language of the bill apparently does not cover a case such as the amendment has in mind. The bill provides that these weighing devices must be approved by the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets once in six months, but there is no provision prohibiting the use of a device during that six months if it is defective, and this amendment proposes to make it unlawful for a user of a measuring device or scale to use it in case it gets out of order within the six months.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. On page 3, in lines 12, 13, and 14, I see authority is given to the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets to seize and destroy any of these scales or devices, tools, appliances, accessories, and so forth; or he may mark or stamp them with the word "condemned." It seems to me that is pretty large authority to put into the hands of a man, to permit him of his own motion arbitrarily and immediately to have the right to destroy these things.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that that is the existing law. There has been no change in that regard.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know that that makes it right. I am not prepared to suggest an amendment, but I am just wondering if the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the committee, has thought of that matter and had his attention directed particularly to those words, and to that very large authority, to let the superintendent go into any place of business and seize any weighing device and any tools, appliances, and accessories and, in his judgment, immediately destroy them.

Mr. MAPES. In order to make the law effective it is necessary to give the inspector some broad powers. A dealer certainly ought not to use a weighing device that is not accurate.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is entirely true.

Mr. MAPES. There has been no abuse of the present law that has been brought to my attention.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have no amendment to suggest, but it strikes me as being a pretty broad power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I submitted a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair, who decided that it was not in order to move a transposition of sections 1 and 31. I am now informed that the Chair thinks possibly he was inadvertent in that ruling, and in order to raise that question in its appropriate place, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1, so that I may offer that motion.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, I think we ought to go along and read these different sections in the order in which they appear in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I lost the opportunity to present the question by reason of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that the practice of the House in the majority of cases is to put the definitions in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That has not been the practice latterly, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a matter of no importance——

Mr. MAPES. For that reason I do not see why the gentleman from Alabama is making so much of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am doing it simply in the interest of what I regard as the orderly method of consideration of the bill. Does the gentleman object?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that when the parliamentary inquiry was made by the gentleman from Alabama the Chair stated that a subsequent section could only be inserted in the portion of the bill under consideration by unanimous consent. The Chair thinks he was in error, if the matter desired to be transposed is proper for consideration at the portion of the bill under discussion. It has been held in the consideration of bills in the House that a subsequent section might be offered in connection with the section then under consideration. The Chair wants to make that statement in connection with the present request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I think we will make better progress if we go along and read these different sections in their order, and for that reason I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat interested in this bill as a moral thermometer of the American people, and I want to ask the chairman if there was any evidence brought before the committee to show increasing dishonesty amongst our people. It seems, if it is necessary to pass such legislation as this measure defines, and with a severe penalty attached, in order that a purchaser may buy an ounce for an ounce or a pound for a pound, civilization has not advanced very far. It occurs to me that the methods of education for the past 3,000 years and the culture and refinement surrounding our homes and the many forms of religion throughout the world have proven a failure if this bill is required to protect our people from exercising fraud one toward the other. Was there any testimony, Mr. Chairman, to show a lowering of the standard of business morality?

Mr. MAPES. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that as far as I am concerned I continue to have a great deal of faith in human nature. But while the great majority of the people in the District of Columbia undoubtedly are honest, the same as the great majority of the gentleman's constituents are honest, there are always a few men in business and in trade who require a law of this kind to keep them from gouging the public. This is for the purpose of regulating those few men and not for those who are honest and do not require a law of this kind.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I am glad the evidence showed that only a few people made this law necessary.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1, on page 2, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARD. I think if the gentleman hears the amendment he will agree to it.

Mr. MAPES. I hope we can finish the reading of the bill. Then if it is thought desirable to return to section 1 we can do so.

Mr. GARD. It is just a short amendment. I would be glad if the gentleman would hear it.

Mr. MAPES. Let us get through with the bill. For the present I object.

Mr. GARD. If it is desired to go ahead in a formal way and if we can not have the proper opportunity of offering amendments, then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-one Members present. Not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Alexander	Brumbaugh	Crowther	Ellsworth
Anderson	Burdick	Dallinger	Esch
Andrews, Md.	Burke	Davis, Minn.	Fairfield
Aswell	Burroughs	Dempsey	Ferris

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8067 and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 279 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 26, insert a new section to be known as section 3½:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby empowered and directed to preserve a schedule of fees to be charged by the department of weights, measures, and markets for their services under the provisions of this bill, which schedules shall be printed and conspicuously displayed in the office of the department of weights, measures, and markets. Such schedule of fees shall be so arranged as to provide as nearly as may be for all the salaries and expenses connected with the office of the department of weights, measures, and markets, and no more. All fees collected by such department shall be paid over to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and be covered into the Treasury of the United States as other revenues are now."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered as a new section is practically a reenactment of section 4 in the existing law approved March 2, 1895. It has for its purpose what I assume is the purpose of similar departments in every city in the United States, at least the cities with which I am familiar, and that is that the department should be self-sustaining as nearly as possible. In other words, where we create a public service, a service of a particular kind, to afford information or assistance to certain persons in carrying on their business, that service should be compensated for by the men for whose benefit it is. Now, the trouble with this bill is, as I view it, that the first paragraph of the bill says that it is to assemble here a great organization of people, paid by the United States of America, and no part of it should be paid by the men who directly receive the benefit.

On page 21 of the bill there is a provision for the appointment of weighmasters and for a schedule of fees to be arranged for weighmasters and those who have charge of the public scales. I assume that it is equally as proper for a man who has his goods weighed on the public scale to pay as it is for one who takes his measure and his scales under the law to the department of weights and measures in order that they may be made standard under the law. The basic idea of the bill is very good, and I am pleased to support it myself, because I think that the tendency in the development of every city is to afford the people of that city honest weights and measures. When weights and measures are fixed by legislation, they should be lived up to. That is the purpose of this bill, and the purpose is carried all the better, I think, by the provisions of section 3½, which I propose as an amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the existing system we have what is called a fee system, have we not?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And that is what the language of the gentleman's amendment provides?

Mr. GARD. Yes. It is what is known as a fee system.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the bill it is proposed to abolish the fee system and pay the entire expense out of the General Treasury?

Mr. GARD. Yes; that is the difference between the bill now pending and the amendment which I have offered. The bill as it comes from the District of Columbia Committee provides that all these fees shall be paid out of the general revenues of the District.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not out of the general revenues of the District of Columbia, but out of the General Treasury, one-half of which would be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. Out of the General Treasury, of which the people of the District would pay one-half and the people of the States one-half under the general plan now in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I understand from what the gentleman said a moment ago that they thought it was not proper policy to have the fee system retained, but it seems to me it is in the interest of efficiency of service and in the interest of efficiency of public economy both to the District of Columbia and to the taxpayers throughout the United States that the people who get the benefit of the examination of scales and of all of the work that these inspectors and agents under this plan perform should pay the salary and the fees. The amendment provides that the schedule of fees shall be so arranged as to pay the salaries and expenses connected with the office of the department of weights, measures, and markets and no more. In other words, it is not a money-making enterprise, but it is an enterprise which seeks to impose upon every man who comes there to have his scales tested, to have his measures tested, the same burden as upon him who goes upon the public municipal scale with a load of merchandise and asks that it be weighed. Under the bill pending it provides that the man who takes his merchandise to have it weighed must pay for it, and under the amendment which I offer it would also provide that the man who goes down and gets the benefit of the expert opinion afforded by this department for the benefit of the people to whom he sells goods should pay the small charge for that service rendered.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, as I said in my opening statement, it seems to me that the fee system in itself is vicious. The man whose business is inspected ought not to be called upon or allowed to pay a fee for that inspection, and a law which requires it proceeds upon a wrong theory. The inspection is required for the purpose of protecting the public, and no dealer or individual ought to be required to pay for the expenses incident to the inspection which is required for the protection of the public. Contrary to the belief of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], the tendency of recent legislation has been to do away with the fee for the inspection, and in many of the larger cities, among them several cities of Ohio, they are abolishing the ordinances and requirements which provide that a merchant who is being inspected shall pay the fees. The Director of the Bureau of Standards in a communication to the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets went into this question very thoroughly, and without attempting to read his letter in toto I would like to read some extracts from it. He says:

In our opinion this system is a very unfortunate one and can not be recommended or defended in any case. It is in effect a tax upon the merchants for the primary protection of the general public. While it is a fact that the inspection of weights and measures undoubtedly protects the honest merchants from the injurious effects of dishonest competition by compelling all to give honest weight and measure and also protects the merchants from delivering overweight through ignorance of the condition of their apparatus, nevertheless the main object of inspection is to protect the consumer from being defrauded by the knowing use of false weights and measures by dishonest tradesmen, and this last-mentioned protection is probably the most important furnished by the department. When viewed in this light the only excuse for the fee system falls to the ground, since it is manifestly unfair to single out one class and burden them with taxes for the whole community. This service is of the character of police protection and all residents receive the benefits of the system. Therefore, the equitable way in which to distribute the cost of the system is by general taxation. * * *

Further along in his letter he says:

4. Nor can the system be defended in practice. Many of the abuses found in connection with the enforcement of the weights and measures laws throughout the country can be traced to the fee system. It prevents the largest measure of cooperation between the honest merchant and the department, which is necessary before the inspection service can reach the maximum efficiency. It discourages "surprise" inspections by the department, since the merchants keep very close watch that they are not required to pay fees any oftener than is required by law. Moreover, the inspectors are constantly tempted to strain a point and put the official seal on apparatus not exactly accurate, since they know that the success or failure of the office is often measured by the amount of fees turned in. Throughout the country this system is falling into disfavor and disuse because it does not produce the best results in practice.

To this letter he attaches a list of cities which have done away with the fee system, and that list includes Akron, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and Columbus, in the State of Ohio, as well as other cities, such as Atlanta, Ga., Albany, N. Y., and a great many others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 6, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That when any commodity is sold by weight it shall be net weight. When any commodity, except coal, is sold by the ton, it shall be understood to mean 2,000 pounds avoirdupois. Coal shall be sold by the long ton, consisting of 2,240 pounds avoirdupois.

SEC. 9. That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person. No such machine shall be maintained for use when the same is not in perfect working order, and the person in charge as well as the owner of such machine or device shall be held responsible for operating or maintaining any such machine or device which is not in perfect working order. A sign or placard shall be placed on every such machine or device in a conspicuous place and shall contain the name of the owner and of the person in charge of such machine or device, and shall state that the person in charge of such machine or device will refund to any person money deposited by him for which the commodity or service promised expressly or impliedly has not been received, and such person shall so refund such money.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 6, line 16, after the words "section 9," strike out all of language in lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, down to and including the word "person."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the language contained in this bill, it seems to me, is unnecessarily drastic in this particular provision. It provides that all automatic vending devices shall be placed in charge of a responsible person and makes it a penalty under this law if they be not. Now, we are all familiar with these automatic vending devices. Coming down the street from where I live in Washington I pass vending devices which are of great benefit to people in the vicinity in the sale of newspapers. The newspapers in the city of Washington are placed on stands with a little cup, and there is an opening on one side of the cup where one may deposit 1 or 2 pennies, as the case may be, for the particular paper. That is an automatic vending device. Now, to say that with such a state of affairs as that—and that is not an extreme case, because more people buy newspapers in the mornings coming from their homes in the city of Washington from these little automatic corner venders than from any other source. In fact, the newspapers maintain automobiles which go about filling these automatic venders and return for those which may be left after the sales are presumably over for the time for which they are issued.

Now, under this law it would be necessary to put some responsible person on every street corner in the city of Washington where the Post or the Herald or the Times or such other papers as use these automatic venders are placed, and it seems to me that the subsequent provision can be so modified as to protect what is manifestly the intent of the law, and that is to protect the vending machine from getting out of order, for the benefit of the person, young or old, who puts 1 cent or 2 cents in the slot machine.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think these newspaper machines are in charge of some responsible person?

Mr. GARD. No; they are not; no.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, does the gentleman think the language means that somebody has got to stand over the machine all of the time?

Mr. GARD. I do not know that he has to stand over it all of the time, but the language says that some person must be in charge, must be placed in charge thereof, some responsible person.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Some one is in charge of those machines who puts the newspapers in every morning, and I suppose takes the money out occasionally. Some one is in charge of all of those machines.

Mr. GARD. I do not think the gentleman's construction of this particular instance I cite can be the construction of this law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why, it seems to me it is perfectly patent that it is the case. It is perfectly certain it is not the purpose of that language to say that some man shall stand by the machine all the time and do nothing else. Then what does it mean; that some one responsible has charge of the machine, looks after that machine, collects the money from the machine, and is responsible to know that the machine is in order and to safeguard its getting out of order? Now, the newspaper is the person here. It does not mean the newspaper agent has to stand by the machine. It means that the newspaper or whoever is in charge knows the machine is in order within a reasonable time after it gets out of order, and if it is out of order is responsible for the money which is put in there when it gets out of order.

Mr. GARD. I agree with the gentleman that is the intent of what the proper law should be.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it is what it says.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] should prevail, does not the gentleman think that after the word "no" in line 20 you should define the word "machine"?

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes. I say if this amendment should prevail there should be an amendment after the word "no" to carry what you have in mind, that a slot or automatic vending machine should be put in there, and I will say to the gentleman that unless this language goes out here that the section is absolutely meaningless, because if there is any purpose in this particular section at all it is that these automatic devices shall be in charge of some one who will see they are honestly conducted for the public benefit.

In other words, if your child goes to a corner where there is one of these devices and puts in a penny and seeks to get a piece of candy or a small section of chocolate, it should be in repair so that the child or anybody else would get the supposed value of the money put in there. Now, to say that this must be in charge of some responsible person is to say that some one must have supervision over the continued working of these machines, not that he should come once a day and look at them, or once a week or once a month.

Mr. LAYTON. I want to say to the gentleman, so far as my experience is concerned in reference to newspapers, I do not think there is anybody in charge of them at all, except that they carry the papers there, and it is the most blessed example of trust I ever saw in my life. You may take your newspaper and need not put down your 2 cents unless you wish to do so. There is not a soul there to see whether you do or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, without taking much of the time of the committee, I just want to call attention to the fact that in order to regulate this matter at all you have got to have somebody in charge of the machine that you can place the responsibility upon. The sentence that the gentleman from Ohio would eliminate does not mean, as the gentleman from Illinois has pointed out, that such person has got to be present all the time. Besides, I am not sure that the machines that the gentleman from Ohio has particularly referred to would come under the designation here as an automatic vending device. They are not much more of a vending device than we have down here at the foot of the stairs, where the papers are all on a table, and we go along, drop 2 cents down, and take up a paper. That is practically what is done at these paper stands on the street. But they are all in charge of somebody, I will say to the gentleman. Not long ago I was waiting for a street car on one of the corners up on the hill near where the gentleman from Ohio lives, and the man in charge of some of the paper stands to which the gentleman refers came along, unlocked the little tin can which was attached to the stand to receive the pennies, and took out the money along early in the forenoon for the papers that had been sold that day. He was in charge of that machine just as much as though he had been standing there all the time. He took the money out of the box on one corner and then went across the street and took the money out of the box there. He was just as much in charge and just as responsible for these particular machines as anyone could be.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I want to ask the gentleman whether regulation ought not to be given to the nickel that you drop into a telephone and do not get the hello for?

Mr. MAPES. You do not drop the nickel in, as a rule, until the operator has answered your call.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. It seems to me that is a more important thing than these papers.

Mr. MAPES. It is true that it is a very annoying thing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a motion to perfect the section.

I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] to the latter provision of this section, which, it seems to me, is the real and only important part of it. It provides for naming some person who shall be in charge of a machine. It then provides there shall be placed on such machine a placard or device of some kind giving the name of the owner and the person in charge. It then provides that if the machine does not work the money shall be refunded by the owner or person in charge.

Now, the language the gentleman proposes to strike out by his amendment is only preliminary to the essence of this section. It simply provides that you must name some one as the person in charge. Thereupon you must put upon the machine itself the name of the owner and the person in charge, and such person must be prepared to refund any money which is put into the machine without its operation. I do not know whether that ought to be done or not. I do not know how much intentional or unintentional fraud may be carried on by these machines. I seldom patronize any kind of slot machine myself and I have not any children to do it. But if we intend to say that the name of the person in charge shall be placed on the machine, then we ought to say as a preliminary that there shall be a person in charge.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. GARD. I agree with the gentleman that the latter part of the section, beginning on line 25, providing for the placing of placards of identification, is the important part of it. I am interested to know what is the gentleman's definition of the words "without placing in charge thereof some responsible person."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that only means that you must put upon these machines the name of the owner of the machine and the name of some responsible person in the District of Columbia who will refund any money improperly collected. I think it is perfectly clear that is what it means.

Mr. GARD. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, of course, if the owner is in the District of Columbia himself, he puts his own name as both the owner and the person responsible. But a large share of these machines are owned outside of the District of Columbia, and they ought to name somebody in the District to whom people will know they can go and collect the money. Ordinarily, probably, it might be a storekeeper in whose store the machine is kept or it might be they would have a general office in the District. That would be sufficient. That covers the trouble. It is the purpose of the section.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that all the purposes of the section would be carried out by the language to which he has referred, and the language which I seek to strike out is but an unnecessary and confusing preliminary?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. You have got to say, first, that there shall be a person in charge before you say they shall name the person in charge. Unless you say there shall be a person in charge, you can not put any provision here that they shall put on the name of the person in charge, because if they do not have anybody in charge then they do not name anybody in charge, and they are not violating the law by not naming anybody in charge.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Ohio has in mind the fact that it is unnecessary to have a person in charge mentioned in the same section twice.

Mr. GARD. Yes. My contention is that the latter part of the section, beginning on line 25 and including the lines on page 7, is a complete statement of what is necessary and the proper one, because, as the gentleman from Illinois has indicated, the slot-machine business in the selling of candy and gum is, in some places, a very considerable business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GARD), there were—ayes 11, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 7, line 2, after the word "name" insert the words "and business address."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think the purpose of this amendment is obvious. The name of the owner of one of these machines or the person in charge, for example, might be John Smith, but it would be very difficult to locate John Smith without the business address being given.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. In lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "placing in charge thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the word "designating," and after the word "person," in line 20, insert the language "who shall be responsible for the operation of such machine or device."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will reduce his amendment to writing to send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that there is merit in this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 6, line 19, after the word "without" strike out the words "placing in charge thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the word "designating," and after the word "person," in line 20, insert the words "who shall be responsible for the operation of such machine or device."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that the objection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is somewhat well taken. The language of this bill as it was drafted by the committee says that "no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person." It is explained that the object of this provision is simply to require that some responsible person be charged with responsibility for the operation of that machine.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman think that his suggested amendment changes the intent of the law at all, or the language of the law, when you read the next paragraph in connection with it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have read the other. I know what it means.

Mr. MAPES. You have read the sentence?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman think that it adds anything to the language of the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not pretend that I possess any power in framing language superior to the committee, but at the same time my amendment makes it clear and plain what the chairman of the committee says is meant by the bill. I think that the language used by the committee is unfortunate because it is not clear. If it would confuse a man of the legal attainments and erudition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], it would certainly confuse some of these weight-and-measure inspectors that the committee is going to have in charge of the execution of this bill.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, that is a very strong argument in favor of its being inserted. But it seems to me when you read the sentence the gentleman's language simply duplicates the language of the next section.

Mr. CONNALLY. That may be in a measure true. If you study and work over it and figure it out, you may probably arrive at what the committee wants to do, but why not say what you mean in plain language? Why employ language that requires a lawyer to construe the provisions of this act? I suppose this bill was written by the man who is going to have charge of its operation. I am almost sure of that, because the chairman himself has suggested that some other provision of the bill was written in a certain way because the man who will have charge of the enforcement of the act did not want it another way. When we make a penal statute it seems to me we should make it plain enough that any huckster could understand it. My amendment simply makes clear what the chairman says is meant by the bill. It would be absolutely foolish, of course, to require every owner of one of these devices to have a man in charge of it standing there over it to see that it properly operates, because it would absolutely destroy the use of that machine, because when you put a man in charge of it you destroy the automatic part of it and make it impossible to operate it profitably. Otherwise the man could go ahead and sell the products himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have just had an extensive debate, pro and con and con and pro, on the subject of automatic newspaper vending machines that are found on some of the street corners of the city of Washington. These machines sell the Washington Herald, which sells for 1 cent per copy in the morning, and also sell other of the Washington newspapers selling for 2 cents a copy, and we have now spent practically all of the day on this measure. We spent all of Thursday and all of Friday and part of this morning on a measure which changed the sacks containing flour and meal from 3, 6, 12, 24, and 48 pounds each to 5, 10, 25, and 50 pounds, and so on. I just want to ask our Republican friends on the other side of the House how much longer they think the country is going to stand for Congress wasting its time on such chicken-feed legislation? Last Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and most of this Monday has been wasted with nothing accomplished except the chicken-food measure mentioned above.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAYTON. The same point of order that I suggested some time ago, Mr. Chairman, and if the gentleman from Texas is trying to save time why does he not quit?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule. The gentleman from Texas is not discussing any matter germane to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like the gentleman from Delaware, without looking at the bill, to tell me what was the word I moved to strike out. He does not know whether I am discussing that very word in the sentence or not. If he looks at it, he might find out. I am discussing the proposition that the people of this country expect the Congress of the United States to get down to business, reconstruction business, that will bring about better conditions in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. We can not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That every person, firm, or corporation shall, when a sales ticket is given with a purchase, cause such sales ticket to show the correct name and address of such person, firm, or corporation and the weight, measure, or numerical count, as the case may be, of each commodity sold to such purchaser, and every such person, firm, or corporation is hereby required to deliver such sales ticket to such purchaser when requested to do so by such purchaser at the time of the sale.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out section 10.

Mr. GARD. I do this because I desire information as to just what the section means. It seems to me it is practically useless. It provides that certain things shall be done when a sales ticket is given with the purchase. In other words, it does not require a sales ticket to be given with the purchase unless the purchaser makes a request for it at the time of the sale. That appears in lines 16 and 17. Now, granting that there may be some benefit to come to one who buys from having this sales ticket, it seems to me the section as it now reads does not care for anybody, because it makes no provision for the compulsory giving of a sales ticket with each purchase. It provides that certain things shall be done when a sales ticket is given, but makes no provision that a sales ticket shall be given unless the purchaser demands it.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. The last clause of the section requires the giving of a sales ticket whenever requested by the purchaser.

Mr. GARD. That does not mean anything, because not 1 person in 500 who goes into a grocery store or other place and buys 10 or 15 or 25 cents' worth of merchandise will request a sales ticket. Now, if it is the idea to make a system of identification necessary with every purchase, then it seems to me the law should be arbitrary and positive in requiring a sales ticket to be given.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think we are going far enough when we give the purchaser the privilege of demanding a sales slip and then let him exercise his discretion?

Mr. GARD. I say that does not amount to anything. If we are to embark on this scheme of legislation at all, we should require sales tickets to be given with purchases.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think people going in to buy a yeast cake or 5 cents' worth of crackers will always want a sales slip?

Mr. GARD. No; I do not think so; and yet in many places sales tickets are given, as the gentleman knows. The tendency seems to be now that when you go to a store and buy from a clerk the clerk gives you a sales ticket, which you take to the cashier—it makes no difference whether you buy a cake of yeast or a ham, assuming that one is well enough off to buy a ham occasionally, as the gentleman from Massachusetts is. But my contention is that as this section 10 now reads it does not apply to anything except where a man asks for it.

Mr. WALSH. Why should it?

Mr. GARD. If it is to accomplish any purpose at all, it should be a general sales ticket to be given by the seller for the benefit of the purchaser, without the purchaser being compelled to ask for it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does my colleague think every time a person makes a small purchase at a store he should be compelled to wait for a sales ticket? He may want to get something in a hurry and put it in his pocket and catch a street car in a few seconds, and he would not want to bother with a sales ticket; but when the housewife orders things by phone, as a great many of them do, she ought to be protected by demanding and receiving a sales ticket with the article she buys. Some of the articles might be lost by the carrier. She ought to be further protected as to the weights and quantities she ordered by 'phone, and thus be able to establish a claim for any false weights.

Mr. GARD. The only thing, in my mind, is whether you should make it general. A man does not want to make out a sales ticket unless he has to.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I think the section is all right as it stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 13 the last word of the line, the word "such." I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia to the fact that the word "such" in that connection is not appropriate, and that instead of the word "such" the word "the" should be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: Page 7, line 13, strike out the word "such" at the end of the line and insert in lieu thereof the word "the."

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me that is all right, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As a consequential amendment the same thing should be done in line 15 and in line 16.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no; it is all right there.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia offer an amendment?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It is suggested that it is not necessary in that connection. I will admit that the same reason for it does not exist as in the first instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia any coal, charcoal, or coke in any other manner than by weight. No person shall deliver or attempt to deliver any coal, charcoal, or coke without accompanying same by delivery ticket and a duplicate thereof, the original of which shall be in ink or other indelible substance, on each of which shall be expressed distinctly in pounds, avoirdupois, the gross weight of the load, the tare of the delivery vehicle or receptacle, and the net weight of coal, charcoal, or coke contained in the vehicle or receptacle used in making delivery, with the name and address of the purchaser and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation from whom or which purchased. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors upon the person in charge of the vehicle of delivery, the original of these tickets shall be surrendered to the official making such demand. The duplicate ticket shall be delivered to the purchaser of said coal, charcoal, or coke, or to his agent or representative, at the time of delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors, or of the purchaser or intended purchaser, his agent or representative, the person delivering such coal, charcoal, or coke shall convey the same forthwith to some public scale, or to any legally approved private scale in the District of Columbia, the owner of which shall consent to its use, and shall permit the verifying of the weight, and after the delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke shall return forthwith with the wagon or other conveyance used to the same scale and permit to be verified the weight of the wagon or other conveyance: Provided, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in a quantity less than 280 pounds and is not weighed in a wagon, cart, or other vehicle, it shall be sufficient for the seller to deliver to the purchaser, his agent or representative, a ticket showing the name and address of the vendor, the name of the purchaser, and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke so sold or delivered: Provided further, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in packages of 50 pounds or less, it shall be sufficient to plainly mark each package with the name of the person, firm, or corporation making such package and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke contained therein.

No coal, charcoal, or coke shall be sold which contains at the time the weight is taken more water or other liquid substance than is due to the natural condition of the coal, charcoal, or coke.

Every vendor of coal, charcoal, or coke shall cause his name and address to be conspicuously displayed on both sides of every vehicle used by or for him for the sale or delivery of coal, charcoal, or coke.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee two questions with reference to the section. I should like to ask what is intended by the phrase in line 14:

Or of the purchaser or intended purchaser.

What significance has that in connection with the duty imposed? What is meant by "intended purchaser"?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Alabama has probably as clear a notion of that as anyone.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I have not. I am asking for real information on it.

Mr. MAPES. The intended purchaser might not want the coal if it was not of full weight. He might change his mind and might not become a purchaser until the delivery was actually made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, he might make a tentative agreement to buy it, provided it came up to the weight?

Mr. MAPES. If he ordered a ton of coal and got only 1,900 pounds he might say he did not want it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In lines 17 and 18 it provides that—the person delivering such coal, charcoal, or coke shall convey the same forthwith to some public scale or to any legally approved private scale in the District of Columbia, the owner of which shall consent to its use.

Is that word "shall" there intended to mean that it is mandatory upon the owner of the private scale to consent to its use for that purpose without compensation and without regard to the convenience or inconvenience of its use?

Mr. MAPES. I should say not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think the word "shall" should be changed to the word "may"?

Mr. MAPES. Personally I think it is quite immaterial.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the language is left in its present form you are putting an imperative duty upon the owner of a private scale to consent to its use.

Mr. MAPES. I think nobody would construe the language to mean that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what it says. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 18, at the beginning of the line strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am asking the chairman of the committee whether there is sufficient protective legislation in the language of the bill as it appears on page 8, line 22, following down to line 4, on page 9. The gentleman has said—and, I presume, very well said—that much of the evil in the city of Washington is caused by people buying very small amounts of coal. This provides that where it is sold in quantities less than 280 pounds, not weighed in the coal wagon, it shall be sufficient to deliver to the purchaser a ticket showing the name and address of the vendor. What good is going to be done by giving the purchaser a ticket unless, to carry out the idea, as we did in regard to the weighing machines, we provide that he is entitled to full weight? Because if one buys 60 pounds of coal he gets a ticket for 60 pounds, but in fact only gets 50 pounds of coal. The only good he gets in addition to the burning of 50 pounds of coal is that he may burn the ticket. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will read the further provisions of the bill he will find that they require the dealer to put on the ticket that he puts on the sack the true net weight. The purchaser of small lots of coal put up in sacks does not have that protection under the existing law which the law gives to those who buy in large enough quantities to have their coal delivered in wagons. There is no law which requires a dealer who delivers coal in sacks to put in any specific weight. He does not often sell it by weight. The information that came to the committee was that dealers in some cases got as high as $25 a ton for coal put up in sacks and delivered to poor people who could not afford to buy coal in quantities of a ton.

Mr. GARD. What is the good of giving the man a ticket unless the ticket is going to accomplish something for him. The seller gives the purchaser a ticket, but the ticket may be willfully or mistakenly wrong.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will read the subsequent part of the paragraph he will see that it requires the vendor to put in the true net weight.

Mr. GARD. That does not make any difference. Suppose he puts the true net weight on the ticket, there is nothing in the bill which provides that the vendor shall give to the purchaser that which is upon his ticket. There is no penalty attached to it.

Mr. MAPES. There is a penalty of $500 fine or six months in jail for the violation of any provision of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired, and the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful to sell, within the District of Columbia, any ice in any manner than by weight, such weight to be ascertained at the time of delivery of such ice, and every person, or in case of a firm, copartnership, or corporation, the person in charge of its business in the District of Columbia, engaged in the sale of ice shall keep on each of his or its wagons or other vehicles used in the sale or delivery of ice, while in use, a scale suitable for weighing ice which has been tested and approved in accordance with the provisions of this act. Every scale used for weighing ice in making sales in quantities of 100 pounds or less shall have graduations of 1 pound or less. Scales used for weighing ice in making sales in quantities of more than 100 pounds may have graduations of 5 pounds or less.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct a typographical omission.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 19, before the word "manner," insert the word "other," so that it will read "ice in any other manner than by weight."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the standard loaf of bread manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in the District of Columbia shall weigh 1 pound avoirdupois, but bread may also be manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in loaves of one-half pound, or in multiples of 1 pound, but shall not be manufactured for sale, sold, offered, or exposed for sale in other than the aforesaid weight. Every loaf of bread manufactured for sale, sold, offered, or exposed for sale in the District of Columbia shall have affixed thereon, in a conspicuous place, a label at least 1 inch square, or, if round, at least 1 inch in diameter, upon which label there shall be printed in plain bold-face Gothic type, not smaller than 12 point, the weight of the loaf in pound, pounds, or fraction of a pound, as the case may be, whether the loaf be a standard loaf or not, the letters and figures of which shall be printed in black ink upon white paper. The business name and address of the maker, baker, or manufacturer of the loaf shall also be plainly printed on each such label. Every seller of bread in the District of Columbia shall keep a suitable scale, which shall have been inspected and approved in accordance with the provisions of this act, in a conspicuous place in his bakery, bakeshop, or store, or other place where he is engaged in the sale of bread, and shall, whenever requested by the buyer, and in the presence of the buyer, weigh the loaf or loaves of bread sold or offered for sale. Nothing herein shall apply to crackers, pretzels, buns, rolls, scones, or loaves of fancy bread weighing less than one-fourth of 1 pound avoirdupois, or to what is commonly known as stale bread, provided the seller shall, at the time the sale is made, expressly state to the buyer that the bread so sold is stale bread: Provided, That any loaf of bread weighing within 10 per cent in excess or within 4 per cent less than standard weight shall be deemed of legal weight.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman what is meant by leaving out crackers, pretzels, buns, rolls, fancy bread, and so forth. I can see why pretzels should be left out at this time, but why crackers put up in standard packages, pounds and half pounds, made by bakers, should be left out I can not see. Can the gentleman advise me why these particular products should not be included in the weight measurement?

Mr. MAPES. Assuming that the gentleman from Ohio is asking the question in good faith, I will say that it would seem that if crackers were required to be of a pound or half pound weight, they would be some crackers.

Mr. GARD. Packages of crackers might weigh that.

Mr. MAPES. This section only proposes to fix the standard for loaves of bread, and does not provide for the sale of anything in packages.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is following his own argument. This provides that it shall not apply to crackers, pretzels, buns, and so forth, weighing less than one-fourth of 1 pound avoirdupois; that is, it does not apply to a cracker weighing less than one-fourth of a pound. Those are things that we should take cognizance of, and I am speaking of the bill seriously, and I ask the gentleman what does the gentleman mean by crackers weighing a quarter of a pound and pretzels weighing a quarter of a pound?

Mr. MADDEN. What States do crackers come from?

Mr. GARD. They have crackers in Georgia.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what it refers to.

Mr. PLATT. Has the gentleman from Ohio taken into account the significance of the word "biscuit"?

Mr. GARD. Biscuit may be included under the common acceptation of the word bun.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that is a satisfactory answer.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the section. I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] to the fact that as the language is now it gives room to the interpretation suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. MAPES. Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia this question——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In a moment. I suggest that in line 10 on page 11 the word "to" be inserted after the word "or," so that it will remove all question as to the application of the section to the articles enumerated. It would then read:

Nothing herein shall apply to crackers, pretzels, buns, rolls, scones, or to loaves of fancy bread weighing less than one-fourth of 1 pound avoirdupois.

Mr. MAPES. Does not the gentleman think that when they weigh more than one-fourth of 1 pound they cease to be pretzels, buns, crackers, and so forth?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, very reasonably you might have a roll big enough to weigh one-quarter of a pound.

Mr. MAPES. I have no objection to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then I move to amend in line 10 on page 11 by inserting the word "to" after the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: Page 11, line 10, after the word "or" insert the word "to."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose the amendment. However, I think it is entirely unnecessary. It only illustrates how important a comma sometimes may be. If the comma were stricken out after the word "scones" the language would mean entirely different from what it is with the comma there. With the comma there, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is unnecessary, and by leaving the comma in and inserting the word "to" you duplicate grammatically something that is accomplished by either one. It is rather dangerous, however, to legislate and fix the meaning of a statute so that a very important meaning may depend merely upon the insertion of a comma which might be left out, and inasmuch as the Printing Office is a law unto itself in regard to punctuation, as I suggest, it would be a dangerous thing. The Printing Office never has followed and never will follow the insertion of commas by a Member of Congress in bills which he introduces; and how this committee ever managed to get the interpretation of the Printing Office here that a comma is necessary after this word, and how it ever succeeded in having it put in instead of having it left out, I do not know, but it must have been by special dispensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 11, by striking out the proviso beginning on line 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 11, line 15, after the semicolon, strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this section 13 provides for a standard loaf of 1 pound avoirdupois, and in the provision it appears that 4 per cent less than that shall be deemed the legal weight. In other words, with 16 ounces in a pound, for bread, for legal purposes in this weight, 12 ounces shall do——

Mr. MAPES. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Four per cent of 16 ounces is all that is meant.

Mr. MAPES. Four per cent of 16 ounces is 0.64 of an ounce.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That bottles or jars used for the sale of milk or cream shall be of the capacity of 1 gallon, ½ gallon, 3 pints, 1 quart, 1 pint, ½ pint, or 1 gill when filled to the bottom of the cap seat, stopple, or other designating mark. Such bottles or jars shall have clearly blown or otherwise permanently marked in the side of each such bottle or jar or printed on the cap or stopple the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation who or which shall have bottled such milk or cream. Any person who uses, for the purpose of selling milk or cream, bottles or jars which do not comply with the requirements of this section shall be deemed guilty of using false measure.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I assume that the purpose of this bill is to establish some standard by means of which we will be able to get what we buy, reduce the cost of living, and make the standard of food better and the health of the people more secure; but I notice that the language of this section of the bill provides that the name of the person bottling milk must be clearly blown in the bottle or printed on the cap or stopple. Of course, that necessitates special bottles, or at least a special stopple, and all of that adds to the value or cost of the bottle, and, therefore, adds to the price of the milk. I do not know what the price of milk is, but it is so high that most of us can not buy it, and to get butter or sugar or anything of that sort is impossible. Every time we legislate here, however, we seem to be legislating to add new costs to the things that we have to eat or the things that we have to use in some way. This kind of legislation does not add anything to the value of the commodity that we have to use. It merely makes the price of living a little higher, as well perhaps as the price of dying. Why all these fads I do not know, except it be for the purpose of taking up the time of Congress. The interest manifested in this sort of legislation is indicated by the number of Members who are absent from their seats.

We just passed a nation-wide standard flour-barrel bill, which makes the standard barrel of flour weigh 200 pounds instead of 196 pounds, and provides that nothing in the shape of flour or bran or meal or corn products shall be shipped in anything else than a certain multiple of a 200-pound container. Of course, that does not apply to the farmer, and it is well, because he is the only man who is exempt from all kinds of regulations, as he ought to be, for he has no hours. He works when the world is asleep, and his farm is working while he is asleep, accumulating wealth by the development of newborn stock, by his growing fields of grain, while the dew dwells upon the fields in the morning and helps to fill the growing grain with riches. But here we are again this gloomy, rainy day——

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Oh, there is a rainbow somewhere.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; you could not have a bow and you could not mix the bow with the rain. I can very well understand how after having a rainstorm the sun may shine through and we may have a rainbow, but——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he ought not to call attention to the fact that there are but 14 Republican Members here to pass this legislation, or the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] might not want that to go into the RECORD. There are exactly 14 Republican Members sitting on the floor attending to business.

Mr. MADDEN. I really have not taken the pains to count the number either of Democrats or Republicans, but this is a nonpartisan measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, as I desire to discuss this bill on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, you say "that bottles or jars used for the sale of milk or cream shall be of the capacity of 1 gallon." Now, most people can not afford to buy a gallon of milk, and certainly can not afford to buy a gallon of cream. We are very lucky in our house if we can get a 4-ounce bottle of cream, to say nothing about a gallon—"half gallon, 3 pints, 1 quart, 1 pint, half pint, or 1 gill"—that fills the bill as far as we are concerned at our place—"when filled to the bottom of the cap seat, stopple, or other designating mark." Most fellows are willing to stand up and drink cream or milk——

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. Does the gentleman mean to say that things are as bad as he has pictured?

Mr. MADDEN. That you can not sit down to drink——

Mr. LAZARO. And while the Republicans are in control of both Houses?

Mr. MADDEN. It is not a matter of who is in control. On the question of milk or cream whether you have got a place to sit upon has got nothing to do with politics. Now it says:

Such bottles or jars shall have clearly blown—

That is, I do not know whether they are to be fly blown [laughter] or not, or whether the name has to be blown in the bottle in the blast—or otherwise permanently marked in the side of each such bottle or jar—

Now how you can mark it permanently without blowing in the bottle I do not know—in the side of each such bottle or jar or printed on the cap or stopple the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation through or which shall have bottled such milk or cream. Any person who uses, for the purpose of selling milk or cream, bottles or jars which do not comply with the requirements of this section shall be deemed guilty of false measure.

You see it is not a question of measure we are dealing with; it is a question of whether you are going to authorize somebody or compel somebody to use a bottle with the name blown in it.

Mr. LAYTON. Not necessarily.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAYTON. It may be marked on the paper.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill says if you use anything else except the bottle or jar or receptacle with the name blown in it, or plainly marked on the stopple——

Mr. LAYTON. Or the cap.

Mr. MADDEN. Or the cap.

Mr. LAYTON. The cap is paper.

Mr. MADDEN. Whatever it is. It comes directly to the point that we are not dealing with the question of whether the measure is correct or not. We are dealing with the question of whether it has a mark upon it. What does that mean? It means an addition to the cost. It means you compel the poor people of the District of Columbia to buy their milk or cream from those who can afford to have their own bottles made with their names blown in them. That is what it means. It does not say the bottle shall be of the size requisite to contain a given quantity of milk or cream. It says the name must be blown in the bottle, and so it is not the quality or quantity of the milk you are seeking to protect, but the monopoly of such dealers as can pay for having their names blown in the bottles. There is no consideration given to the mere consumer. All he is required to do is to pay the bills, while the milk baron who can have his bottles made with his name blown in continues to charge what he pleases while the children of the poor, who are unable to pay the price, go hungry. But who cares for that if the man with his name on the bottle is protected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment. Being in entire sympathy with the solicitude of the gentleman from Illinois with respect to this section, I move to strike out line 22, beginning with the word "such" and ending with the word "cream," on page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 11, line 22, after the word "mark," strike out lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, and line 1, on page 12, to and including the word "cream."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] has been so overcome by the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. This provision of this bill I do not imagine will require a bit more work or more labeling on the bottles of milk delivered in the District of Columbia than are now put on them by every milk dealer in the District, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN and Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 5, noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That standard containers for the sale of fruits, vegetables, and other dry commodities in the District of Columbia shall be as follows:

(a) That standard barrel for fruits and vegetables, other than cranberries, shall be of the following dimensions when measured without distention of its parts: Length of stave, 28½ inches; diameter of heads, 17⅛ inches; distance between heads, 26 inches; circumference of bulge, 64 inches, outside measurement; and the thickness of staves not greater than four-tenths of an inch: Provided, That any barrel of a different form having a capacity of 7,056 cubic inches shall be a standard barrel. (l) No person shall sell, offer, or expose for sale in the District of Columbia any fruits, vegetables, grain, or similar commodities in any manner except in the standard containers herein prescribed or by weight or numerical count; and no person shall sell, offer, or expose for sale, except by weight or numerical count, in the District of Columbia any commodity in any container herein prescribed which does not contain, at the time of such offer, exposure, or sale, the full capacity of such commodity compactly filled: Provided, That fresh beets, onions, turnips, rhubarb, and other similar vegetables, usually and customarily sold by the bunch, may be sold by the bunch.

All kale, spinach, and other similar leaf vegetables shall be sold at retail by net weight.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 8, after the word "vegetables" insert "and other dry commodities."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 8, strike out lines 8 to 25, inclusive, and lines 1 to 4 on page 13.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this language which I seek to strike out is the language of the act fixing the standard barrels for fruits, vegetables, and other dry products, which passed March 4, 1915, and which is in effect and applies specifically by the provisions of the act to the District of Columbia. I can not quite see why it should be reenacted in this measure, because it applies here now and will apply hereafter, and if the gentleman desires to fix a standard for other dry commodities I submit that by eliminating this paragraph (a) and enacting the balance of the language of the section that he has taken care of the situation, but certainly it adds nothing to just reenact something that is already the law. It seems to me that it would be better to rely upon the standard vegetable barrel act that has already been enacted; so I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, if he thinks there is any serious objection to eliminating this language from the bill?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, of course it is not very important if the law already applies in this language to the District of Columbia, but it does no harm one way or the other, it seems to me.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman, I have here before me, in volume 38 of the Statutes at Large, section 2, the standard which is fixed in the language as contained in the bill. It is as follows:

It shall be unlawful to sell, offer, or expose for sale in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to ship from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, a barrel containing fruit or vegetables, or any other dry commodity, of less capacity than the standard barrel defined in the first section of this act.

And so forth.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman it has been my understanding that this was the national law. The language is supposed to be the same as contained in the national act.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. What is meant by the term "and other dry commodities?"

Mr. WALSH. In this act it means grapes, and so forth.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it confined to fruits and vegetables?

Mr. WALSH. And products that are sold in baskets or barrels and containers.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from South Carolina suggested a moment ago that it might be broad enough to embrace the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, if it was put up in barrels.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] a question. Do these standards fixed here harmonize throughout with the Federal laws for the country generally, in so far as Federal laws have been passed?

Mr. MAPES. In so far as Federal laws have been passed they do. There are quite a number of cases where the Federal Government has not covered the subject. In those cases the provisions of this bill follow some of the State laws and are recommended by the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, now, I had in mind, for instance, this specific situation: In my section of the country the sweet potato industry has in recent years become a very extensive one. There is a fixed size for the hampers in which potatoes are shipped.

Mr. MAPES. Which paragraph is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. GARRETT. Really I am just speaking generally of this act. The potatoes are shipped from the market there in hampers of a certain size. I do not know whether there is a Federal statute fixing the size of those hampers or not. I know that under a Federal law the quantity contained in the hamper has to be stamped upon it. I know that the hamper is supposed to contain a certain number of pounds. As I started to say, the custom is to ship these in the hampers, and those hampers, of course, go from the jobber in the city to which they are shipped to the retailer. Now, the question is, if you fix the size of a container here in which they may be sold in the District of Columbia and that does not happen to harmonize with the hamper in which they are shipped from the place of production, it seems to me it would bring about a great deal of inconvenience.

Mr. MAPES. There is a separate paragraph here that applies to potatoes, I will say to the gentleman, and requires that if they are sold in sacks the sacks shall contain 60 or 90 pounds.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, in the particular section with which I am familiar the potatoes are sold in hampers and are not shipped in sacks. I am speaking of the sweet potato.

Mr. MAPES. I do not see the language to which I was referring, but it is here somewhere.

Mr. GARRETT. You have a provision here, on page 15, as follows:

The standard hampers for fruits and vegetables shall be the 1-peck hamper, one-half bushel hamper, 1-bushel hamper, and 1½-bushel hamper.

I assume that would apply to potatoes. I do not know that any potatoes are shipped from my section to the District of Columbia, but I am saying this to illustrate the point.

Mr. MAPES. The purpose of that is not to cover commodities that come from other States, but that are sold and measured here in the District, and it aims to do away with a lot of the small and different shaped containers that are now used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. This exhibit, to which I have referred before and which was taken by the Department of Agriculture, contains the pictures of a lot of different containers, of varying sizes and construction. The purpose of this section is to do away with those and to establish a standard one-half bushel, 1-bushel, and 1½-bushel measure.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know whether I made myself clear or not. The point is this: I know that in the case of sweet potatoes they are shipped in hampers. They look something like the photographs on the sheet the gentleman has. Under the Federal law the content must be stamped upon the hamper.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is under the pure-food law.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, perhaps it is. Now, those hampers are worth this year 20 cents. That is what the basket or hamper costs. Now, they are shipped in that size. If you fix a different size here in the District of Columbia, then those hampers are worthless when they come here. If they are different, if the retail man can not take the hampers in which they come and sell the potatoes from those hampers, but must change them to another, there is a loss of 20 cents on every hamper.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I think that it is one of the objects of the bill to do away with the different sized hampers.

Mr. MADDEN. The thing that occurs to me in connection with this whole business is this: The gentleman from Michigan says it is not necessary to ship them in any particular kind of a carton or hamper into the District, but the bill requires the man who sells them in the District, after they get into the District, to put them into one of these hampers, and, of course, that adds to the cost. He can not sell them without putting them into the hamper prescribed. Of course, it amounts to an outrage to do this.

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman that when I was at home recently sweet potatoes were in the local markets at that time, and the potatoes were selling for 50 cents, and the hampers were worth 20 cents, although the potatoes are worth two or three dollars a bushel here now.

Mr. MAPES. What is the capacity of that hamper?

Mr. GARRETT. It is not quite a half bushel. It is of a fixed size, and the content of the hamper must be stamped on the hamper before it is shipped. I do not know that any sweet potatoes are shipped from my section into the District of Columbia, but I know they are shipped to the East, particularly to Boston, and so on. I hope you are not bringing about a situation here that will destroy the value of the hamper, because the hamper is worth nearly half as much right now as potatoes.

Mr. MAPES. What we are trying to do here——

Mr. MADDEN. Is to make two hampers instead of one——

Mr. MAPES. Is not to get an additional hamper. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is mistaken about that. What we are trying to do is to assure the customer here, when he buys a bushel of potatoes, that he will get what he pays for—that those potatoes will be measured by a standard bushel basket and not by a hamper such as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has in mind.

Mr. GARRETT. Let me say to the gentleman that the content of the hamper which is shipped in interstate commerce is marked plainly on it now, under the Federal law, the pure-food law. So long as it is in the original package the content would be known to the customer, because he could look at the top and see.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan rose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is recognized.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the trouble the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] speaks of will arise under this bill. The law cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is a law passed some years ago fixing the standard measure of several different kinds of containers. As far as that law goes, and only as to containers named in that law, has the size and capacity of containers been fixed by Federal law, and they have been quite generally, or perhaps universally, accepted and adopted. They have, I think, been adopted by the laws of most of the States. But there are a number of measures, a number of kinds of containers, that are not mentioned in the law referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]; their size and capacity have not been fixed by that statute. If the bill we have before us deals with none other than those that are dealt with in the law now in force, or deals with none other than those that are in universal use throughout the country, no trouble will arise. But it seems to me that this bill does deal with a lot of containers the capacity of which, the size and shape of which, have not been determined by Federal law nor have they been accepted by all the States. And shipments of products into the District of Columbia coming from a State in containers contrary to this bill, although of size and style and capacity approved by the laws of that State, can not be sold or exposed for sale here in the containers in which they arrive.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Would the gentleman wait until every State in the Union had passed a law before protecting the inhabitants of the District of Columbia?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Oh, I believe in universal standards in these matters, but I doubt if this bill as now before us is altogether a protection to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Suppose from the State of Tennessee comes a container with so many pounds of sweet potatoes in it, the container being plainly marked, the capacity, size, and form of the container being legal and proper as fixed by law by the State of Tennessee and as used there a legal container; a shipment of potatoes in such a container is made to the city of Washington, with the number of pounds plainly marked. If such container differs in any respect from the containers described in this bill, those sweet potatoes in the container could not be exposed for sale in the city of Washington, although the number of pounds is clearly marked on the container. There is no way by which the purchaser could be deceived. If this bill becomes law, those potatoes must be taken from the container coming from the State of Tennessee and put in one of the containers described in this bill. Unless the containers are of the style, size, and capacity already fixed by Federal law, and therefore accepted and universally in use throughout the country, it seems to me we are treading on dangerous ground in enacting this law. I feel it will be imposing a burden not only upon those who produce the products in other States, upon those who ship them to the District of Columbia, but also upon the merchants here. In the end the trouble and expense will fall upon the consumers, the people of the District. It is intended by this bill to protect them from fraud and expense, but I fear instead we are imposing trouble and expense upon them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What became of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]? Is not that to be voted on now?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we ought to have a vote on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] now moves to strike out the section. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Beginning on page 12 strike out all of section 15.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to call the attention of the committee to my interpretation——

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will first come on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the Chair rule that I can not debate this now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may debate it.

Mr. MADDEN. My interpretation of the section that I move to strike out is that if I were a truck gardener raising potatoes or any vegetables or fruits outside the District of Columbia, and came here with a wagonload loose, and came down here to the market, I could not sell them to consumers in the District of Columbia without putting them into one of the containers provided in this bill. Now, of course, that means an additional expense to the purchaser, and instead of surrounding the people of the District of Columbia with safeguards against those who seek to impose upon them you are giving all kinds of monopolies the right to impose upon the people. So I say that this section of the bill, instead of doing what it purports to do, does exactly the reverse of that. Why, a man might ship a carload of potatoes from Illinois or Michigan, for example, from the State where the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. MAPES] lives, and that is one of the great potato States of the Union. One of the gentleman's constituents might have worked hard all summer to raise these potatoes with a view to placing them on the market in the District of Columbia, thereby giving the people who bask in the sunshine of the Capital something to eat which they could not otherwise obtain, and they would not be permitted to buy these potatoes, the best in the world, coming from Michigan, raised in the sands along the shores of Lake Michigan, flavored by the breezes blown across the lake. So the Michigan farmer who has gone to all the trouble of raising these potatoes and bringing them all the way to the District of Columbia finds himself handicapped by one of his own Representatives here, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], chairman of this great Committee on the District of Columbia, preventing him from selling potatoes which he went to so much trouble and expense to raise, unless they are willing to pay for an additional container.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. That is no worse than the condition with regard to flour. On the top of page 18 of this bill it provides that a barrel of flour shall be 196 pounds in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. That is less than it is to be anywhere else.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the bill which we passed this very morning, everywhere in the United States flour must be sold in amounts of 100 pounds or 200 pounds. You can not sell 196 pounds of flour elsewhere, as you can in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, we come to the question whether the people of the District of Columbia are considered residents of the United States, whether as residents of the United States they are entitled to any protection from the Congress of the United States, and whether the people of Michigan, the greatest potato raisers in all the world, are to be mulcted out of the profits that they otherwise might be able to make, by being compelled to buy containers before they can sell the potatoes which they bring into this territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will not prevail. I appreciate his purpose in offering it, because it is simply a reenactment of the existing law as to the standard fruit and vegetable barrel; but the committee acted advisedly in this matter, knowing that they were reenacting the existing law, because they wanted to have a comprehensive statute fixing these standards, so that the inspectors and those who have to do with the enforcement of this law would have the entire law before them in one act. That was the reason for it. I do not think it is a matter of great importance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The language of the law and the bill are the same as to this particular proposition; but the gentleman knows that it is necessary to have somebody with authority to fix tolerances as to the sizes of barrels, I take it. Now, the law applicable everywhere else and also applicable in the District of Columbia now provides that these tolerances and variations shall be fixed by the Bureau of Standards under the Department of Commerce, while this bill proposes to authorize the District Commissioners to fix the tolerances. Does my friend from Virginia think it is desirable for Congress to provide a standard of weights and measures which shall be in force everywhere in the United States except in the place where Congress has plenary power—in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that I think the officers enforcing the law in the District of Columbia ought to have authority to regulate tolerances as well, because the whole statute comes before that inspector, and he can enforce the entire law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, then that makes the law applicable outside of the District vary from the law inside of the District.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Vary slightly, but it does not vary except as to the manner of its execution, and as to that I think we ought to have the whole law before the inspector without requiring his resort to a general statute.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I am very much in sympathy with the purpose of this bill. I think it is highly desirable as far as possible that the law should be codified and made uniform and explicit, so that people who sell commodities may know that they are within the law and people who buy may know the amount that they are getting.

But here is a proposition offered by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. We have a national law, only recently passed, fixing the standard size of barrels for fruits, vegetables, and other dry commodities other than cranberries. That is the act approved March 4, 1915, not so very long ago. Now, as to the size of barrels, it was the purpose of the committee to have this act simply copy the present law. I can sympathize with the view they had in mind to have a whole law before the inspectors in one act, although it is quite as easy to print a copy of the national law as it would be to insert this section in this bill. But here is the difficulty. You have got to have some provision for variations or tolerances when you fix the size of packages. The present national law provides that a reasonable variation shall be permitted and tolerances shall be established by rules and regulations made by the Director of the Bureau of Standards and approved by the Secretary of Commerce. Under that law they have fixed tolerances and reasonable variations that shall be allowed. This bill proposes that the District Commissioners shall fix the tolerances. It may be that they will fix the tolerances and variations the same as they have been fixed by the Director of the Bureau of Standards and the Department of Commerce, but they are not required to. Suppose they do not. Then we would be put in the anomalous position that the Congress of the United States, having exclusive jurisdiction of legislation in the District of Columbia, have provided a general law applicable outside of the District, where it is doubtful if we ought to exercise the power, fixing standards on one basis, and then inside the District standards of a different basis. It is unthinkable to me that a sensible body should establish such legislation. There is no harm in leaving this provision out of the bill, which is in the law now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. I should like to ask the gentleman while he is on the floor for his opinion as to the effect of this legislation on the containers in which products are shipped, where they do not happen to conform to the size laid down in this bill for the District.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In the first place, as a matter of practice, unless I am mistaken, all of these things are taken out of the containers where they are shipped from outside into the city.

But I do not think there is any difficulty in people complying with the requirements as provided here. If, for instance, they ship sweet potatoes from the gentleman's district, they undoubtedly have hampers of a certain size, or various sizes——

Mr. GARRETT. It is a standard size.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The standard size recognized in the East is based on the bushel basket.

Mr. GARRETT. I think these hampers are 90-pound hampers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the standard is usually based in the East on the bushel. But I do not think there is any difficulty even if the dealers have to get a few new hampers.

Mr. GARRETT. I suppose they could be retained in these hampers even if the hampers did not conform to the hampers provided here, and they could be sold from those hampers by weight or numerical count. I assume that to be true from the language on page 16, but I doubt whether they could be sold in the hampers themselves unless they happen to conform to the standards in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no possible way of fixing the standard sizes for anything——

Mr. GARRETT. Without tolerances.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Without cutting out some things in existence. Of course, it would be a desirable thing to get the same standards if possible all over the country.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is manifest that there is no quorum present, and that this bill can not be finished to-night. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia, to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIAL. I have received from Dr. Watson, secretary of the war work commission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Washington, D. C., resolutions concerning the treaty of peace and league of nations, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS CONCERNING THE TREATY OF PEACE AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"We stand to-day little more than a year removed from the date of the armistice—November 11, 1918—that marked the beginning of the successful termination of the greatest war of world history. In this awful conflict of the nations our country bore a most honorable and heroic part. Our sons leaped to the colors with wonderful enthusiasm; our people everywhere consecrated their all to the high purposes for which America entered the war; our ministers offered themselves without regard to sacrifice that they might serve our sons in camp and field, minister to them in service, bury them when dead, mark their graves, and comfort the loved ones bereft. Many of our ministers and consecrated laymen gave themselves wholly to service as soldier pastors, Young Men's Christian Association secretaries, Red Cross and all manner of welfare and relief work; while our women, young and old, at home and in the field, gave themselves in an unparalleled service to ameliorate the horrible conditions of war.

"Many priceless lives were given to accomplish the great ends of truth and righteousness for which we fought. These willingly laid down their lives for a cause so high, noble, and Christlike. They sleep across the seas amid the flowers of Flanders, and their graves are kept with loving care by those who were delivered from destruction by their valor. Others no less glorious in their sacrifice fell victims to disease in the camps, on the seas, or beyond. We cherish the memory of all as hallowed, forever immortal, in the sacrifice they made for world freedom.

"The survivors have returned to us with victory upon their banners. We give them glad welcome, and forever cherishing the memory of their valor and devotion to justice and freedom winning the applause of the world, we join with our returned sons in the great reconstruction made possible by them.

"We may never know how much of the glorious victory of our armies was due to the cooperation of the church, but the power of this divine agency has been abundantly and gratefully acknowledged by the Christian men who led our Army to battle and to victory. While we may not yet have sufficient perspective to estimate the hand of God in it all, and the passing years may demonstrate more fully and clearly the divine hand and purpose, already those who have eyes to see the movements of spiritual forces must see clearly the hand of God in gracious protection and in the final decision of His will to bring a righteous peace to the earth. When we were in the midst of the conflict the church uttered her voice in no uncertain sound, and with the command of spiritual authority bade her sons go forth to battle in the strength of her Lord.

"We would here review some facts bearing upon the church as an instrument of God in bringing peace. The year 1918 opened with the world in terror lest the aims of Germany be accomplished, the struggle of the Allies lost, and high principles of freedom perish. January 8, 1918, President Wilson, animated by the same high principles that had guided him throughout the terrible conflict, gave out the now world-famous 14 points of peace. February 15 Germany resumed aggression against Russia. April 14, showing the desperate character of the situation, the allied armies of France and England called Gen. Foch to the command of both armies as general in chief. May 25 German U-boats sunk 19 coastwise vessels, and May 27–30 German armies overran Chemin des Dames, enveloped Soissons, reached the Marne at Chateau-Thierry, divided the French and English Armies, put the English Army to fighting with backs to a tottering wall, and occupying both sides of the Marne were shelling Paris with a long-distance gun, and the world was paralyzed with horror at the thought of the end.

"But the American soldiers were being landed in France in such numbers as to make the world marvel. At this moment of supreme crisis May 30 was fixed as a day of humiliation and prayer to God by order of Congress and presidential proclamation, and the noon hour of each day was soon thereafter fixed as an hour of prayer. June 1 American troops went into action.

June 6–12 the Second Division of the American Army, including the American Marines, bent back the German lines at Chateau-Thierry and started the retreat of the German hordes that was kept up without real break until driven within their own territory, and an armistice was sought by Germany. October 14 Germany made overtures of peace to President Wilson, but was positively informed by him that there could be no peace until Kaiserism was ended. October 19 Austria's offer of peace was rejected, but October 23 President Wilson, standing absolutely alone and against the advice of his Cabinet, of Congress, and of popular feeling, made reply to Austria's further overtures, standing upon the original 14 points, but referring the decision to the Allies. This resulted in peace with Austria, after which Germany was compelled to accept terms, and the armistice was signed November 11, 1918. Thus, clearly through the church, and through a man born in a manse, reared in the faith and true to its high principles, not only was peace made but the lives of multiplied thousands of our sons saved who otherwise must have been sacrificed before the strong fortifications of Metz could have been taken.

"We are not willing to believe as we study these providential facts marking the hand and will of God that our high ends and God's gracious purpose will have been accomplished in a mere temporary victory over our enemies. Our President, our sons, we all, we confidently believe, had enshrined in our hearts the great principles of universal justice learned at the altar of the church of Christ and in our Christian homes. For these high things we consecrated all and demonstrated that consecration in deeds of physical valor and moral heroism that will be the theme of song and story to the end of the ages. It remains now for this Christian Nation to erect to the memory of those who died and to the honor of those who came back to us from the gates of death a nobler monument than a passing shout or an arch of triumph. The world lies plastic to our hand. It must be made anew. For the first time in the history of the world the statesmen of Christian nations have been moved to look upon the world's needs, and have the opportunity to establish in it a new order patterned after the teachings of the Prince of Peace. The peace conference at Versailles, led by our great President and influenced by the splendid ideals to which he consecrated all his masterful powers at tremendous cost, brought forth a treaty that embodies in a league of nations the nearest approach to the ethics of the New Testament ever promulgated in the history of nations. It is the first attempt to apply to the world in political relations God's thought for the world. It sets forth the divine plan in organized political life that the strong protect the weak, and looks toward the expression of the world's conscience in the dealing of one nation with another. It is an application to practical international politics of the Sermon on the Mount and of the supreme principle enunciated by Jesus, 'Whosoever loveth his life shall lose it.'

"We covet for our Nation the supreme distinction of transmuting into international custom the high ideals of our gospel. While we would not be impatient with any reasonable delay on the part of those representatives of our Government who are charged with the difficult task of consideration of the treaty and who would and should give the closest scrutiny to this momentous document establishing a great spiritual venture, we are disappointed that agreement has not been reached and that the future of this great document now appears in hazard.

"Believing that delay in reaching such agreement as will permit the adoption of the treaty with the league of nations without resubmission to the allied powers in peace conference will not only prevent speedy reconstruction in our own country but will breed incalculable disaster at home and throughout the world; and

"Believing that failure on the part of the Senate of the United States to reach an agreement will seriously embarrass this country in international relations, in that this Nation would thus be left without any pact or agreement to cover business relations with Germany; would be called upon to deliver all interned German ships and alien property into the hand of the Allies without power to call for return of property of this country in German hands; that all claims for damages would be practically nullified without recourse to war again with Germany; that the United States would thereby be robbed of the right of participation or representation on the reparations commission; would have to submit any separate treaty negotiated to the other allied powers for ratifications, thus losing prestige and finally holding up the final readjustment of the war-torn world conditions, and possibly plunging the world again into war before the desired ends for which we fought are accomplished: Therefore

"Resolved (1), That we urge the Senate of the United States, as that great body reassembles December 1, to immediate consideration of the great document of the treaty and the league of nations in such spirit of statesmanship as shall make possible a harmonious conclusion in the adoption of the treaty with such reservations as will not in any way weaken the high purposes of that document or make necessary its withdrawal or its resubmission.

"Resolved (2), That should no conclusion have been reached prior to that time, Sunday, December 14, be set apart throughout this conference as a day of special prayer for divine guidance in leading our Senate to a conclusion in harmony with God's will and purpose, and that should no agreement be reached prior to that time effort be made to have all churches throughout our country on Christmas Day, December 25, and on the Sunday of Christmas week, December 28, make special prayer for divine guidance that such conclusion may be speedily reached as will accomplish the will of God in this crisis of the nations.

"Resolved (3), That we assure President Wilson of our great appreciation of the service he has rendered at such cost to himself in behalf of the world in striving to bring the ideals and principles of the word of God into international relations, and that we earnestly pray God's blessing upon him in speedy restoration to perfect health, that he may lead on to fullest realization of the holy purposes for which our country gave her best."

"We believe that the time has arrived when Americans should assert themselves and drive from these shores all disloyal aliens and adequately punish those who betray their country by disloyal acts. We hereby call upon the United States Congress to immediately enact a law providing for the summary deportation of every alien in this country who is a member of the I. W. W. or any other organization of like teachings and tendencies;

"That the law should further provide for the immediate cancellation of the citizenship papers of any naturalized citizen who shall affiliate with any such organization, and for drastic punishment of all persons who belong to or uphold the doctrines of such organizations.

"We believe that no person should be permitted to issue or to circulate any writing or pamphlet which has for its apparent object the undermining of American institutions or the inciting of rebellion.

"We further demand that Congress forthwith appropriate sufficient money to carry forward properly and promptly the deportation of undesirable aliens; be it further

"Resolved, That the entire membership of this lodge does hereby tender its services to the United States Government for any assistance which the said Government may desire.

There have been considerable requests from outside for copies of the report.

Mr. SMOOT entered the Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just come into the Chamber, and I desire to repeat the request which I have made for the printing of 2,000 additional copies of the report made under the resolution for an investigation of the high cost of living in the District of Columbia. Mr. JONES of Washington. I send to the desk sundry amendments which I desire to offer to the pending bill and which I was preparing when the bill reached the point of passage yesterday afternoon. I ask that the amendments may be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, we have been waiting a good long while for this bill to come before the Senate to be acted upon. I have such a high regard for the committee that I dislike to differ with them in their conclusions. I have, of course, no criticism to make of their motives, but I differ with them in their conclusions and in the foundation of this bill.

We have tried Government operation, and I think it is generally conceded that it is a failure, not so much, however, as it appears upon the record. During the progress of the war the rates paid to the railroads for carrying soldiers were greatly reduced, and that went into the deficit. Not only that, but when the Government took charge of the roads they were in a very run-down condition, a very congested condition. It was some six months before an increase of rates was granted to the railroads. Not only that, but during the war we operated the roads not for profit but to win the war, and that was a sufficient consideration. It matters not whether we lost $550,000,000 in the two years or did not lose it; we won the war, and that is what we were trying to do. It was not a question of running the roads economically; it was a question of getting the freight and the soldiers where we wanted them delivered. I believe in giving Government operation a fair trial, and giving it due credit for what it was entitled to; but outside of all that I think the consensus of opinion is against Government ownership or Government operation.

Now, Mr. President, we come down to the present bill. It occurs to me that this bill starts off out of tune. It is on the wrong basis. Of course, it is very much desired that we should get a bill that will be equitable to the owners of the railroads and will be just to the employees, and we would like to get the unsettled conditions that have prevailed in this country back to normal at as early a date as possible. I had hoped that this bill would do it, but I feel that it is the most burdensome proposition that ever was presented to a United States Congress.

It starts off, Mr. President, on an ideal basis. It is a dream, as it were; it is an illusion to go ahead and undertake to say, as the bill does say practically, that every dollar invested in railroad property shall receive enough return to pay 5½ per cent interest on the actual value of the property.

Nothing is said in the bill as to how you shall get at the actual value of the property. We all know, or at least we were told, that heretofore the railroads were greatly burdened with watered stock, and all that kind of thing; but I need not go into all that now. We will just say to them: "Well, go and sin no more." If it is possible leave that out, but we must meet the conditions as they exist to-day.

This bill, as I understand, undertakes to let the roads make a return upon the actual value of the property; and it is one of the hardest things in the world to find out what the actual value of that property is. I believe that this Government has been trying to find that out for the last several years. It is not nearly through with the task now. I did not know at the time we passed the bill for valuing the railroad property of the country that it would do much good, but we have gone along with it. Before they got nearly through with the task, of course, the value of the property changes. It would cost now perhaps 50 per cent more to build a railroad than it would three or four years ago, and then the figures may vary considerably between now and the time they complete that estimate.

Not only that, Mr. President, but I can hardly see how it would be a practicable proposition for the Interstate Commerce Committee to fix the value of the property in order that this stipulated return may be made. They are very competent to deal with the question, but it seems to me that it would be impracticable for them to get at that.

Now, to say that it is desirable that every dollar's worth of property in the United States should receive a return equal to 5½ per cent of its actual value would be ideal. I would be very glad for every man in the United States to get a 5½ per cent return upon his money, or any other amount that would be adequate and just; but for the Senate to come here and say, "We now stamp a certificate of value upon every dollar invested in railroad property; we say that every dollar of that property is worth 100 cents," is entirely too advanced a proposition. We do not take into consideration whether or not it was necessary to build some of these railroads, we do not take into consideration whether it was necessary to maintain some of them, but we just go down and at one vote say that every dollar invested in railroad property in the United States is worth 100 cents, and by this bill we practically guarantee that it is worth 100 cents. We underwrite, as it were, the securities of the railroads of this country.

I have no ill will, Mr. President, against the railroads. In fact, I have no unkind feelings toward any investment. I feel rather favorable to railroads. We need them. But I must say that a great many errors have been committed in the name of interstate commerce in this country. We should not now, in this time of inflated values and in this period of hysteria, lose our judgment so much as to say that every road that has been built heretofore has been a good investment and that this Government should practically take it over.

I do not mean that the bill provides that the Government has to assume the debts of the roads; I do not mean that; but the bill does say that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall levy a freight rate sufficient to let the roads make a return upon their investment.

When we once take that step we practically guarantee, as far as we can by a moral obligation, that hereafter a freight rate will continue to be levied so as to let every dollar of investment and of value get a return for the balance of time.

Now, we let those railroads float their securities, and we encourage women and children and people who can not work, but who have means, to invest in railroad securities, and by this measure we will be in honor bound hereafter to keep up the freight rate to a sufficient amount to let them pay the 5½ per cent interest on that money. Every five years, I believe, they can revise it; but at the present time and for all future time we are committed to that policy.

We do not treat any other property that way in this country. When the war came on we told automobile factories to go and make trucks and munitions of war; we changed them over. We told cotton mills to change. I know of my own knowledge that the Government went to the cotton mills and said, "Make certain kinds of cloth and we will pay you so much for it," less than the market price. Yet the cotton mills did not complain. We went to the farmers and said, "Here, we want you to raise wheat instead of cotton, or something else. We want you to raise hogs, whether it is profitable or not." And no good American citizen complained.

The railroads did not complain, as I say; but we are putting them up here now in a higher class. We are making them a class unto themselves. We are giving them special privileges over any other class of property in this country.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this would be done irrespective of whether or not that railroad ought to have been built, whether the railroad has been properly managed, whether it is necessary to the commerce of this country.

Then, Mr. President, I believe the bill is wrong in this, that it guarantees to the owner of that property a certain return upon the value of the property, irrespective of the use of the property. It does not say that you will give a return upon what is handled, the number of passengers it carries, or the freight that it handles; but it says, "We will pay you a certain per cent upon your property." It is like hiring a dray and saying to the drayman, "We will pay you so much on the value of your truck for a day, whether you haul 1 load or 10 loads." It is contrary to business principles, Mr. President. So I say it is on a wrong basis. That is one of the main objections I see.

It does say that after they have earned a certain amount a certain part shall be put into a sinking fund or some other fund and a certain part shall be turned over in another way to help out weaker roads.

That, Mr. President, is going into paternalism. It is paternalism run mad. Not only that, but, to my mind, it is unconstitutional to take away from the railroads their well-earned receipts, to go to well-built and economically managed roads and say, "Here, you shall get so much upon your investment, and no more." I can not see it. I am somewhat of a lawyer, and although I do not profess to be a great constitutional lawyer, that does not sound constitutional to my mind.

It is certainly not for the best interests of this country that we destroy the initiative, the energy of people, their determination to make their property succeed and to get the greatest return upon it. When you say, "You shall get so much and no more; the balance will be turned over to a weaker road to help bring that up," it reverses all the teachings we have listened to for these 70 years of railroad operation. It destroys the inducement to succeed and try to excell that brought this country up to where we are now. We have developed the marvelous resources of the country by individual effort, and I would regret to see anything done that would put a stop to that effort.

Here we are dealing with the biggest proposition in the United States—the railroads. This is a most comprehensive bill, a bill dealing with the most comprehensive question that has ever been brought before the country, and now if we go and say to the railroads, "You shall not make any more than a certain amount," we will encourage extravagance in the management and we will destroy the inducement to build new roads and to develop other sections of our country. We have plenty of territory in this country that is not scratched by the railroads yet, and I do not see how, if this bill is passed, there will ever be another mile of railroad built. In fact, we have built very few miles of railroad since 1912.

That, to my mind, Mr. President, is a fatal defect in the bill. If we destroy an investment, as I say, the desire to succeed, the effort to give accommodation to the traveler and the shipper, to encourage prompt delivery, and things of that sort, then we have destroyed the great value of the railroads of this country. We shall have made drones out of the people who manage the railroads if we establish this principle here.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the American people are imitative. We imitate each other in dress, we imitate each other in architecture, and in other things; and when we stop railroad building here, and the inducement to build railroads, we are going to discourage the desire to build mills, to develop mining, and to carry on our wonderful development of this magnificent country of ours. It would be a sad day for the ingenuity, the intelligence, and energy of the American people, to my mind.

Now, of all times in our history, Mr. President, we ought to be working longer and we ought to be working harder and we ought to be saving more so as to be able to develop our trade and give employment to our people. When we establish this principle in regard to the railroads, I am afraid that it will be imitated by people who operate mills and are engaged in other enterprises. Therefore it would be a death knell to progress, as I see it.

Mr. President, I want every man in this country to have a fair opportunity to make his own fortune under the protection of the law. It is not the place of the Government to go into business. If a business is a legitimate one, it is the province of the citizen to engage in it and not the business of the Government to compete with him. But this bill here is worse than governmental ownership. The Government guarantees the business and gets none of the profits.

Mr. President, this is too long a bill for discussion now in all its details. But the more I read it and think about it the less I am pleased with it. We have innumerable commissions provided for here. We take away from the directors their authority over the property and vest that authority in the board of transportation. The members of that board are to look after the details of the roads; they are to look after issuing the stock; they are to look after the helping of the weaker roads, and all that kind of detail, functions that ought to be exercised by the directors, and I am opposed to any proposition that would take the management of the property out of the hands of the people to whom it belongs and put it in the hands of somebody else.

The bill goes on and provides that there shall be two employees selected for the board of directors, men who have no financial interest in the property. That, Mr. President, is illegal in many States of the Union. In South Carolina you have to own stock in a corporation before you can become a director in it. Not only that, but to be a director in a national bank you have to own 10 shares of stock. You have to be a stockholder in it. The idea of taking away the control of property from the people to whom it belongs and turning it over to somebody else is revolting to my mind. That is not the way to encourage people to invest their money.

If the people in this country who had money were looking out for an investment, do you suppose that they would go and build a railroad or build a cotton mill or purchase a mine if they knew that they were to be told by the employees how many hours they would work, what output they would make, or what they should get for it? No. The capitalist would buy Government bonds. That is what I would do, instead of putting it in an enterprise where the management would be taken away from me and put into the hands of somebody else, and I think any other man who had any sense would do the same thing.

Mr. President, not only that, but the bill authorizes the formation of a wage commission, composed of four employees and four other men designated by the railroad company. They may go into a back room and fix higher wages or impose some other condition. The property has no representative there; it has nobody to speak for it. That committee goes then to the transportation board, a board the members of which are not directors. They are Government employees, and we have too many of those now.

Somebody would be appointed on that transportation board, some of these economic fellows whom you hear about, some fellow who talks about figures and who never earned a dollar and a half in the sunshine in his life. Yet, some long-haired, impracticable, visionary, ill-advised, good-meaning fanatic, with whom we have this country overridden to-day, will go and say that they should have higher pay, and bring up this brotherly love we are hearing of in every movement, and all that kind of slush, in the hysteria we are in. The owners of the road would have no say in that, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have a veto upon it; but the employee and the Government's impracticable, visionary fellow would fix it up, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, under this law, would be compelled to levy a sufficient freight rate to pay the increased charges.

It is time, Mr. President, that the working people of this country, the people who do something, who have something, the people who pay taxes, were being heard.

I have no particular ill will against any class, but I am tired of hearing all the time of shorter hours, less work, and more pay. If we would follow the advice given by my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] yesterday in his admirable speech, this country would soon become normal and we would get back upon our feet; we would have our products for export, to fill our ships with; but as long as we are trying to work less with more pay, a kind of a tapeworm feeling, to get a dollar without equivalent labor, we will not be of any account. We will raise people in this country who are dependent, and not independent people.

Mr. President, the bill provides for yet another kind of a commission. There are so many that I can not keep up with them. I will not try to go into the details; it is too burdensome, and would take too much of the time of the Senate. But you can not turn around in Washington without running into a commission. I start out any morning and pretty nearly fall over a fellow talking about this or that commission. I want people to go home and go to work and be content with what they are getting. I want them to be in love with their work, and if you do not love your job, for God's sake resign it. You can quit and let somebody else have the position.

But, Mr. President, we are asked here to give the stamp of approval of the United States to every dollar invested or alleged to be represented by values in railroad securities in the United States. Look at it, Mr. President. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the quotations of railroad stocks in the paper to-day, to show you how low they are quoted. The railroads must be overcapitalized or the stock must be selling at a very low price. I quote some closing quotations of yesterday:

Not only that, Mr. President, but here and now, in this time of greatest inflated values in our history, after this war, when we all admit that everything is about 50 per cent higher than it has been heretofore or will be after a little while, we are asked to fix this rate.

Mr. President, I do not complain of the rate of 5½ per cent interest on money. If I could have gotten that rate on the amount I borrowed, I would be much better off to-day. I have been a pretty constant borrower for the last 30 years. But I do say, and I want to read to the Senate just a moment, that if you take the return from the railroads according to the chairman's speech you will develop this situation: He says they want to guarantee the freight—I do not mean guarantee it except by income; let them get enough freight to get 5½ per cent interest on the money. Three years before the war——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be compelled to raise the present very high rate in order to secure 5½ per cent?

Mr. DIAL. Absolutely. That is my understanding of the bill, that it gives them the power to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a mandatory provision that they can enforce in court?

Mr. DIAL. I think so. I think we have taken away from them all discretion.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Interstate Commerce Commission fails or refuses to put in a rate sufficient to bring 5½ per cent, then they can file a petition in any United States court and mandamus the commission into producing the rate?

Mr. DIAL. I so understand the bill. According to the speech of the chairman of the committee, for three years previous to the war the No. 1 railroads of the United States made 5.2 per cent upon the value of their property. It is right interesting, though I never did like figures much, to look at some of these roads. Take the Southern Pacific, for instance; that earned

4.99 per cent. The Chicago Great Western earned 1.7 per cent, and various other roads earned various rates. I ask permission to insert this in my remarks, quoted from the report of the chairman of the committee on page 11, showing the incomes of the different roads in class 1 for three years previous to the war.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the test period for ascertaining compensation under the act of March 21, 1918, the average net annual operating income of the class 1 railways was 5.2 per cent upon the aggregate property investment account. There are, however, wide differences when the individual carriers are considered. Under this average the New York Central System earned 6.09; the Pennsylvania Co., 6.26; the Pennsylvania Railroad, 5.36; the Delaware & Lackawanna, 7.54; the Erie, 3.56; the Baltimore & Ohio, 4.67; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 7.02; the Chicago & North Western, 6.13; the Missouri Pacific, 4.43; the Union Pacific, 6.72; the Southern Pacific, 4.99; the Northern Pacific, 6.27; the Great Northern, 6.79; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, 6.16; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, 4.71; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, 4.72; Chicago Great Western, 1.77; Chicago & Alton, 2.64; Western Pacific, 2.28; Colorado Southern, 3.04; Missouri, Kansas & Texas, 2.81; Texas Pacific, 3.76; Wabash, 2.91; Western Maryland, 2.58; New York, New Haven & Hartford, 5.96; Boston & Maine, 4.80; Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, 1.95; Atlantic Coast Line, 5.76; Seaboard Air Line, 3.68; Southern Railway, 4.12; Louisville & Nashville, 6.32; Illinois Central, 5.48.

This statement shows that some are away down as low as 1.99 per cent, and yet we are asked to fix it at one move at 5½ per cent. I am not complaining of money at 5½ per cent myself.

Another part of this proposition is this: They say that is a class 1 railroad. I presume that is one of the most prosperous roads; I do not know. But the chairman of the committee does say further on in his report that "railroads carrying 30 per cent of the freight of this country before the war were not self-sustaining."

That is the remarkable part of this bill to me. We come to admit that practically one-third—I do not know whether as to mileage, but it does not make any difference whether it is mileage or quantity—of the railroads of the country before the war were bankrupt, and yet here now we are asked at one vote to make these roads solvent and make their value 100 per cent on the dollar, and guarantee a 5½ per cent return on that for the balance of all time.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee, with the permission of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I do not understand that the bill guarantees 5½ per cent upon all roads that are denominated class 1. It takes the aggregate value of the roads as it shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission within the respective districts and guarantees 5½ per cent interest upon the aggregate stock; but some of the roads within the district will in the future, as in the past, do the greater amount of work; they will carry the larger part of the commodities within the district, so that other roads perhaps will only get 2 or 3 per cent upon the value of their property. The larger roads will earn very much more, but the excess goes into the fund which has been described. Do I interpret the bill correctly?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah has stated the matter correctly. There is no guaranty in the bill at all. There is a declaration of public policy to guide the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is that the net annual operating income on all the railroad properties within a given district shall be as nearly as may be 5½ per cent upon the value of all the railroad property in that district. But when rates are so based one road may earn 8 per cent upon the value of its property just as heretofore, and another road may earn 4 per cent upon the value of its property as heretofore.

What the bill does which has never been done before is to take from the railroads which earn more than we regard as a fair return upon the value of their property, the excess, and put it in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of supplying a fund with which the weaker, the poorer, railroads may be furnished with a credit. It is not given to the weaker railroads, but it enables them to borrow money in order to enlarge or better their facilities under circumstances that would not enable them to borrow money in the general market. That is the whole scope of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield further?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the latter part of page 13 of the bill. As I understood the Senator, he said that the provision about 5½ per cent was a declaration of a policy and was advisory to the commission. If I understand the meaning of the English language correctly, that can not possibly be true under the terms of the bill. I read——

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say it was advisory to the commission. I said it was a declaration of public policy.

Mr. McKELLAR. And not a guaranty?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not a guaranty. It can not be called a guaranty.

Mr. DIAL. It is a direction.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a direction to the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read the words of the bill, which I believe not only are a direction to the commission but are in such direct and positive language that it would require any court to which the matter might be appealed to issue a mandatory injunction to give such a rate as would produce the 5½ per cent. I read the language of the bill:

The commission shall—

"Shall"—there is no doubt about it—

The commission shall initiate, modify, or adjust rates, fares, charges, and classifications, as nearly as may be, so that the railway carriers as a whole allocated to each district and subject to this act shall earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to 5½ per cent upon the aggregate value, as determined in accordance with the provisions hereof, of the railway property of such carriers in the district held for and used in the service of transportation.

As I read that language I am compelled to the conclusion that it is an absolute guaranty enforceable in any court having competent jurisdiction.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I can say is that the lawyers upon the Interstate Commerce Committee do not agree with the Senator from Tennessee. It may be that the Senator from Tennessee is right about it, but that is not my opinion nor is it the opinion, so far as I know, of any of the lawyers upon the committee. However, that makes no difference. It is the intent of the bill that there shall be raised a revenue that will be equal to 5½ per cent upon the value of the railway property in a given district, and the merit of the bill can be tested by that assumption. I am sure that no member of the committee desires to escape from the responsibility of approving that proposition. If the Members of the Senate believe that 5½ per cent upon the value of the property which renders the service is too great a compensation for the use of the property, that is a matter for discussion and for settlement in the Senate, but there is no use to complicate it by the suggestion that resort can be had to the courts. I do not think there could be any such resort; but it makes no difference; we intend to try to raise 5½ per cent upon the value of the property which is devoted to the public service. If that is too much, it is for the Senate to express its judgment upon that point.

Mr. KING. The Senator's statement would seem to indicate that it is in perpetuity. As I read the bill, every five years thereafter the interest could be revised.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, that it true. There is no perpetuity in any bill. There is no talk about imposing conditions for all time. That is fanciful, to say the least. We have expressly provided that at the end of five years the Interstate Commerce Commission shall review the whole situation, and if it believes a 5½ per cent basis is too high it shall reduce it, and if it believes it is too low it shall raise it. There is no permanent condition being provided for here.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator indulge me for just a moment?

Mr. DIAL. I will yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] that if they have any notion that these railroads can be financed at less than an earning of 5½ per cent on the total railway valuation in their respective rate-making districts, I am satisfied that when they investigate it they will change their minds about it.

In the provisions in the bill for repayment to the Government of the money for which we have authorized the President to accept the notes of the companies, the Government is made to charge the railroad companies 6 per cent on that loan. That is not an unreasonable amount of interest to charge, and yet at the same time we say to the railroads, "You shall not earn on your property as a whole to exceed 5½ per cent."

Mr. DIAL. I do not say that.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the force of the Senator's position, nevertheless.

Mr. DIAL. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the chairman of the committee one question. The chairman of the committee says it is not a guaranty and that it is not a mandatory provision, but that it was the intention of the committee and the lawyers of the committee to regard it as a declaration of policy. Is the Senator from Ohio or the committee willing to have it specifically stated in the bill that it is a declaration of policy?

Mr. POMERENE. It is a rule of rate making.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us put it in the bill, then—a rule of rate making. Let us say what it is, and do not let us say "shall initiate," because when you use the language that is in the bill it is mandatory upon the commission, and any court will enforce it. I am convinced of that, the distinguished lawyers on the committee to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] upon a moment's reflection will see that it is not susceptible of judicial enforcement. It is mandatory in a proper sense of that word because we intend that the commission shall do that thing. We do not attempt to conceal or avoid that fact. But the Interstate Commerce Commission must survey the situation and must look into the future; it must undertake to determine how much business shall be moved in the future for a year or two years. It must make up its mind, as best it can, with regard to the volume of commerce that will be moved upon the railways, and, taking all those uncertain things into consideration, it is charged with the duty of making rates that will create a net operating income of 5½ per cent upon the value of the property.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], I am sure—for he is one of the best lawyers in this body—must at once see that it would be impossible for a court to declare what rate shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to bring about the result which the proposed statute contemplates. May I add a word to the Senator from South Carolina while I am on my feet?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been very much interested in his discourse, and I want him to remember one thing; that is, that we have provided in this bill for a 5½ per cent basis upon the value of the railroad property that actually renders the service in transportation. The value of the property is to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The figures the Senator suggests with reference to the percentages of return in the test period of three years before the 1st of July, 1917, are comparisons with the property investment account of the railway. A great many people believe—and I am one of them—that the value of the railway property which renders the service—mark you, there is an immense outside or extrinsic investment in property which is not related to the work of transportation—I am one of the persons who believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission will find that the value of the railroad property which renders the service is much less than the property investment account. Therefore, when comparing percentages growing out of the test period with the percentages under this bill that fact ought to be borne in mind; and I have no doubt the Senator from South Carolina will have it in mind as he proceeds with his discussion.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I am not trying to find fault with the bill, but I am endeavoring to get a bill which we may all support. Will the Senator tell me upon what theory we can justify that feature of the bill which proposes to levy rates on the railroads in order to provide for the nonself-sustaining roads that carry 30 per cent of the freight? In other words, how can we justify the feature in this bill that proposes to take one road out of bankruptcy at the expense of other roads?

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator again state the early part of his statement? I did not catch it.

Mr. DIAL. How can we justify ourselves in stabilizing, as it were, the roads carrying 30 per cent of the freight of this country which could not support themselves before the war? Are we justified in saying that their value is so-and-so, and that rates shall be levied sufficiently high to enable them to earn an income of 5½ per cent?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it is possible to render that relief to those railroads which carry 30 per cent of the traffic which we ought to render. As I said in my opening statement upon the bill, there is but one way in which we can reach a safe position, and that is through the process of consolidation. With roads varying as widely as the roads of the United States do, you can not put upon the country a body of rates which will render justice to each of the railroads, but we must do the best we can; and the railroads which are now suffering from loss of credit and from underincome will do a little better under this bill than they ever did before. That is all we can promise them or hope for them until the consolidation in some form takes place.

Mr. DIAL. The point is this: We are making them special pets; we are making them our wards. The Government did not tell the owners to build the roads, and the Government is not responsible for their condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from South Carolina does not have the same idea probably about the object or province of government that I do. I think that government is organized for the protection of the weak——

Mr. DIAL. It is organized for the protection of everybody, I think.

Mr. CUMMINS. For the protection of the weak as against the aggressions or the power of the strong. There are some people in this country, and there are some corporations in this country, that need no protection from the Government, that are abundantly able to protect themselves; but there are other persons and other corporations that are unable to protect themselves, and we must do the best we can to see that they are maintained if they are necessary to the public welfare.

I do not think that in trying to protect the weak we ought to do any injustice to the strong; but this bill does not do injustice to the strong. It provides that the roads may retain of their earnings all that common carriers ought to retain—a reasonable and fair return upon the value of the property which renders the service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a question. Take the 30 per cent of the railroads that were not self-sustaining before the war. As I understand the provisions of the bill at the bottom of page 12 and at the top of page 13, the reasonable income of 5½ per cent is given to those railroads, together with all the remainder of them. Is it fair or just for the Government to take practically one-third of all the railroads of the country that have not been self-sustaining in the past—perhaps because of inefficient management or improper service—and put them on a 5½ per cent basis whether they earn the money or not?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not upon a 5½ per cent basis.

Mr. McKELLAR. This bill requires the rate to be fixed so as to bring them, together with all other railroads, upon a 5½ per cent basis.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator misunderstands the bill entirely.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will read it to the Senator, and see what he thinks about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator need not read it to me; I am perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. DIAL. If the Senator from Tennessee is not correct, then a good many of us misunderstand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had hoped that I had explained that so that it was fully understood. The value of all the railroad property in a rate-making district is ascertained. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission sits down to the labor of adjusting rates which will return or create a net operating income for all the railroads in that district.

Mr. McKELLAR. Including the 30 per cent which are not self-sustaining.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will have to go back, in view of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Interstate Commerce Commission then attempts to adjust rates so that the aggregate operating income of all the railroads in that district will be 5½ per cent upon the aggregate value of all the railroad property in that district. Those rates are then established, and the railroads begin to carry freight under them. Upon those rates one railroad will not earn 3 per cent upon the value of its property, while another railroad may earn 7 per cent upon the value of its property, just as we observed during the period before the war that all the railroads of the country earned 5.2 per cent upon their property investment account. That did not mean, however, that every railroad in the country earned a net operating income of 5.2 per cent; it meant that one railroad earned 6 per cent, another 8 per cent, another 9 per cent, another 4 per cent, another 5 per cent, another 3 per cent, and some of them less than 1 per cent. That is the way it would occur measurably under this bill until there can be such a process of consolidation as will make the various systems of railroads in this country bear the proper relation to each other. I beg the pardon of the Senator from South Carolina for interrupting him in this way.

Mr. DIAL. That is all right; I am glad to have the Senator's explanation. We are merely trying to get the best possible solution of this problem. I do not think I said, at least I did not intend to say, that the Government guaranteed a return of 5½ per cent. I meant to say that under the terms of this bill, in case it passes, that would be the result; that we would instruct the Interstate Commerce Commission to levy rates that would yield that amount and then when we had once done so we would put the stamp of the Government's approval upon this investment; that it was worth a hundred cents on the dollar, and that thereafter it would earn that per cent. That is as far as I meant to go. Therefore it implies a contract to the public of this country and every other country that may buy our railroad securities that such action will be taken, although in the future, of course, it may be changed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DIAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I apologize for interrupting the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the statement which he has just made is rather inaccurate, namely, that it puts the Government's stamp of approval upon all the issues of the railroads and is a guaranty, in effect, that those issues will all earn 5½ per cent in the future? As just explained by the Senator from Iowa, there is no guaranty or promise that these roads will earn any figure. The rates will be adjusted so that 5½ per cent will be earned upon the value of the property in the various rate districts, as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but many of the corporations unquestionably will not earn 5½ per cent; they may not earn 2 per cent or even 1 per cent. I know corporations, notwithstanding the so-called guaranty, that will not earn 1 per cent or certainly not more than 2 per cent.

This bill does not propose to make up the deficit between 2 per cent and 5½ per cent. Other roads in the various rate-making districts will earn much more than 5½ per cent, as they have done in the past——

Mr. DIAL. Then, they will have to lend it to the weaker roads.

Mr. KING. But the roads that have not had much traffic in the past, that have not earned any very considerable sum in the past, will not, in my opinion, by this bill be put in a position to earn relatively very much more in the future than they have earned in the past. The only advantage is, as the Senator from Iowa has said, that in a way it stabilizes conditions; it uses the amount above 5½ per cent which is earned by some roads as a Government fund for the purpose of loaning, if it sees fit—and perhaps that may be mandatory; I do not know as to that—for transportation purposes, so that the poorer roads may be permitted to borrow money from the Government when they can not borrow it from private banks. As I understand the theory of this bill—and there are many features of it I do not like at all—the plan is to preserve the weak roads from such delinquencies as would result in their abandonment. The theory is that the railroads in the United States are essential to the welfare of the people; that it is a sort of governmental function—and I do not quite agree with the broad statement of the chairman of the committee—to furnish transportation to the people; but, assuming that the Government is interested in the transportation problem, the theory of the bill seems to be to preserve the weak roads from destruction because their preservation is necessary for the welfare of the people.

Mr. DIAL. More than that, in this brotherly-love bill that we have here, one of these numerous commissions is allowed to divert freight from one road and give it to that weaker brother over there.

Mr. President, when I lived out in the country and read the newspapers I used to hear about protection, and that was a great issue along about presidential election years, but I think this is protection run mad. We heard about protecting our infant industries in this country, and things like that. I do not wish to inject politics into this debate at all; but here, just at one time, we are going not only to protect the income of the enterprise, but we protect the whole enterprise and practically become a guarantor of the investment. We have gone into partnership, and we stand behind, as it were, the whole investment here, and in the very short space of a few hours we are about to forget our history and become protectionists at one time. This is the biggest protectionist jump I ever saw.

Furthermore, Mr. President, under the provisions of this bill, if these roads are required to take out a Federal charter, I do not know whether that deprives the States of some rights or not; but certainly, if that goes through, there should be some provision whereby those roads may be sued in State courts as national banks are now sued.

Not only that, Mr. President, but I am very much afraid that if this bill goes through with a provision for railroad districts, dividing this country up into rate-making districts or zones—groups of roads, I believe is the wording of the bill—when that is done, then in the more populous parts of the country, where they have the richer roads, perhaps it will cost much less to carry produce to market and militate against the weaker parts of this country, where freight rates will have to be higher. That is to say, in order to make the 5½ per cent they would not have to levy nearly as much of a charge for freight where they have a thickly populated country as they would in the case of a thinly populated country; so I am somewhat skeptical about the future progress of this country under this bill.

Moreover, the bill changes the policy that we have taught here for the last 25 years. I have not sympathized with a good deal of this antitrust legislation debate. I believe in letting an enterprise, whether individual or corporate, get out and hustle for its living and do the best it can; but under the theory of Congress here we have been saying to capital, "You shall not consolidate over this country," and here, all at once, just at one breath, we are asked to do away with our independent railroad lines and at once consolidate the railroads of the whole country into a few systems.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator have in mind the fact that these consolidations can not be entered into except under a plan which has been theretofore prepared by the transportation board and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and which is subject to their supervision all the time; and does not the Senator further recognize it to be a fact that one of the things which were demonstrated during the so-called Government control of the railroads was that where there was greater consolidation in the management of the railroads there would be greater efficiency?

Mr. DIAL. Well, that is a pretty big proposition, Mr. President. I realize, as I remember the bill, that it has to be done under the supervision of somebody; but I have failed yet, in my limited experience, to find perfect men in this world. I do not find them here; I did not find them before I came here; and I do not expect to find them after I leave here; and I believe, Mr. President, that one of the troubles of this country to-day is that on account of a multiplied press sending all kinds of literature over this country we are teaching people ideas that are not practical, that are visionary, and when we get into Congress we hear speeches made every day complaining about the innumerable commissions and boards of investigation, and everything of that kind, and places where we put some fellow who knows theory and does not know practice, and we do not know what kind of legislation he will allow to be put upon the people of this country. I would rather trust men who have made something and who know what they are doing and who know more practice and less theory.

Mr. President, in regard to this 5½ per cent return, as I said before, I have no objection to 5½ per cent. In fact, it sounds like pretty small interest to me, and I am not objecting to the best roads making 5½ per cent. I do not care if they make 20 per cent if they do it under proper Government regulation and proper Government restrictions and proper freight-rate regulations. If we do our duty, and if the owner of that railroad employs less people and gives greater service and gives greater efficiency, let him make whatever he can make. It will be due the stockholders of that company.

I am not one of those who would go ahead and say because people own an enterprise that the Government should come in and take it away from them. I have a heart as big as the Atlantic Ocean for the man who goes out and puts his money into an enterprise and creates that enterprise and builds it up from the beginning. That is the kind of railroad we need in this country, and other industries as well. Let them have the actual dollars invested in the property, and put their reputation behind the property, and their energy, and their good will, and their decency, and the people will patronize it; and I am not envious of what per cent of return they make, if they are paying the Government their proper taxes like other people, and, of course, under Government regulation. I do not believe in special privileges at all, but I am teetotally opposed to the drone, and that is what this bill is coming to.

If you will allow me, Mr. President, I can think of one little illustration that describes this proposition very forcibly. It is a homely one. It is one that I heard my father tell many years ago. I was reared down in the country, and after the War between the States a few rich people down there owned rifles, and the poor white men owned single-barreled shotguns; and a farmer then was going to run for the legislature, and when he got there he was going to have a bill passed to top all the trees, so that a poor man could shoot a squirrel as well as a rich man who had a rifle. [Laughter.] That is about like this bill here now; it is going to take away from the rich road to help the poor along.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. I may have omitted some of the boards provided for in this bill; there are four or five of them; but it is a very easy matter, Mr. President and Senators, to find fault, and I am not of that class. I am glad to say that I am an optimist, and I always expect to be one. I have an abiding faith in the American people, and I feel that it would be one of the greatest imaginable calamities to do anything to chill their ardor; and I hope now that we will get back on our feet, and give ourselves time to cool off, and let everybody get his bearings, and we will get this thing straightened out in a short while, and we will be the most prosperous country in the world, as we are now, and should be, and we will be much more prosperous.

Mr. President, I would not care much myself if this Government would get out of all kinds of business. I do not believe in the Government tampering with business. We are scared to death now about getting along without sugar. It would not hurt us if we got along without it for a little while. It would not make much, if any, difference. We can do without many things. Why, we get scared to death if we can not buy clothes, and so on, and so on. I would not mind if Congress passed a law to-morrow taking the Government out of every kind of business, and out of the control of the commerce and the business of this country, and letting it go back in the hands of the people. It is true that some prices would soar, perhaps, sky-high; but it is also true that people would go to work then and start up new enterprises, and they would create more of those articles and put them on the market, and it would be only a little time until competition would regulate those things. I believe that would be about as good a thing as we could do. Of course, we do not want to freeze to death this winter, nor do we want to perish in any other way; but after a little while I think that is the best course this country could take. I believe that if you do not like a thing you ought not to buy it. You would not have to buy it.

Furthermore, Mr. President, in all seriousness—and I have said what I have said in seriousness—the way I feel about the matter is that if we go ahead right now and pass this bill we are practically making the United States guarantee billions of dollars. I do not like to say "billions," because I do not know what a billion is; but there will be a guaranty of billions of dollars entailed upon the people of this country, I feel, forever hereafter, and I do not believe it should be done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. In the first place, I take issue with the Senator's statement that this is a guaranty. The distinguished chairman of this committee made it perfectly clear that this was not a guaranty; that it was simply a rule of rate making. But the Senator makes the statement that we are guaranteeing billions. If this be a guaranty of billions, how much less would the Senator make the rule for rate making, if he would reduce it below 5½ per cent?

Mr. DIAL. I will come to that a little bit later. I do not mean guaranteeing in the strict sense of sitting down and signing your name at the bottom of a document, but I mean morally. We have been hearing a good deal here—all last fall—about moral obligations in connection with the peace treaty. We all know something about moral obligations, and that is where we landed.

Mr. President, we ought to pass some kind of a railroad law. We all admit that, and I do not believe it is kind nor just to criticize a measure unless you have something better to propose. I have not written out anything, but I will give the Senate my views, just in a few words, as to what I think we ought to do.

As I said before, I feel kindly toward the railroads. I have no animosity whatever toward them. We need railroads in this country; but we must not go ahead and commit too many sins in the name of the railroads and in the name of interstate commerce. I believe that what we ought to do is this:

We took charge of the roads during the war. We had to take charge of the roads. I do not think the railroad people have any right to come in here now and complain. We were in a war. We did not want to get into that war. We did everything we could to stay out of that war, but we were forced into it; and if we had not gone in and had not taken charge of the railroads' property, and if the Germans had come in and captured us and had captured the railroads' property, then what would their property have been worth?

I think that the railroad owners of the country are no less patriotic than the rest of us. Whatever this Government wanted during the war, when they called on us as true American citizens, they got it. If they wanted my coat in order to win this war, they could have it; and I would have raised no objection, and no true, patriotic man would have raised any objection. The railroads did not do it then, and they should not now. We took their roads and we won this war, and that is a good answer to all these claims of extravagance and anything else about them. Just let us wipe it out, and pay the bills, and say no more about it.

We did go and establish a Railroad Administration. They did go and employ more people, perhaps, than should have been employed. They spent more money, perhaps, than they should have spent; and now this country is in an unsettled condition; but the railroads are not the only ones whose employees are disturbed. The employees of the rest of us who have enterprises are disturbed, too. Our boys went to the war. They shut down our production and our factories down home, as I know of my own knowledge.

What we ought to do, in justice to the roads and in justice to ourselves, is this: We ought to be honest with the roads, and with ourselves, and with the public, and with everybody. I think a short bill ought to be written here, to say to the railroads: "Here is your property, after so many days"—say, 90 days, or something like that. "Now, railroads, we will guarantee you the same return you have gotten heretofore"—the standard contract, I believe it is called—"we will guarantee you that return for six months, say, thereafter, to allow you to get your bearings, to go back home and to get back to your old basis of operation and to become normal again. Now, there is your property. Take it and run it like other people are doing."

I believe that would be equity to the railroads. I believe that is all they ask, or ought to ask. I believe that is all the burden you ought to put upon the American people. Then, Mr. President, if we decide that this anticombination law that we have had heretofore ought to be repealed, let us go ahead and repeal it. I wish we would repeal a number of the laws that we have passed, especially the Adamson law. We started out wrong there. Then, we ought to repeal any tariff regulation or any other law that interferes with the normal course of affairs and let our people get back to a normal condition, so that everybody can stand under the laws of this country on the same basis. I do not think we ought to say to the railroads, "We will guarantee you a return of so much on the money invested in your property." We have carried them along for a time. I have no objection to getting money at 6 per cent and loaning it to them at 5 per cent, so far as that is concerned. Let us throw them out a plank, if they need it, and help them along, but I do not know of any reason why we should guarantee them a sufficient rate to make 5½ per cent upon every dollar of their investment.

Let the Interstate Commerce Commission levy a fair rate, as it has been doing heretofore, and, if it is necessary to increase it, increase it. I do not believe in giving gratuities in any enterprise, in individual matters or other enterprises, but I believe in efficiency and economy, Mr. President.

Now, Mr. President, that would be, I think, justice to the roads. I do not care what you make it. Be more liberal with them, but do not put this Government into partnership, as you do in this bill, with the railroads of this country. The people are the silent partners; they pay the fiddler, Mr. President, if this bill passes. You take the road away from those to whom it belongs and put it into the hands of the Government.

Then, further, Mr. President, we have seen all these recent strikes in this country, and we think perhaps it is necessary to pass more laws. If necessary, then let us pass an antistrike law with reasonable restrictions in it. I do not believe in making any man work if he does not want to work, if he is able to make a living without working. On the other hand, I do not believe in the employees tying up the railroads or the shipping interests of this country, tying up the commerce of the country, and making the people freeze to death, and perhaps starve to death, certainly suffer great financial loss and injury. I believe in saying to a laboring man, "When you become an employee of a quasi-public corporation, you should enlist for a certain time, and then if you have any difficulty there should be some way to force an arbitration between you and the employer." Never take it away from the courts of this country, where our rights and liberties belong. "Furthermore, if you want to quit, quit, but you should resign and give a reasonable notice of intention to quit, so that the railroad can employ some one to take your place." I believe that we ought to advance that much, Mr. President.

I am a better friend of labor than a great many of these so-called friends of labor. I believe in creating enterprises and giving men employment to improve their conditions as to housing, education, conditions of living, and everything of that sort. I have practiced that for many years at home. I have a large number of friends of that class who are friends, indeed, Mr. President. Then you will have nobody working for you who does not want to work for you. I have employed thousands of men in my life, and I can count on the fingers of one hand to-day those who do not want to come back to me. Treat them as you would like to be treated. Understand their necessities and their requirements. Pay them what your business will justify.

I would not want men to work for me, and the railroads would not want men to work for them, unless they want to. Therefore there ought to be good feeling, good fellowship, between the railroads and the employees and other employers and employees in this country. But when you say we believe in six hours a day and five days a week that is contrary to Divine Writ. You can not make a living that way; and when you go further and say that you do not want people in the penitentiary to work, I say that I believe everyone who is in prison ought to be made to support himself if it is possible to do so.

There is a good deal of nonsense and tommyrot about minors working. I wish the women and children did not have to work. But they tell me that a boy 13 or 14 years old, a great, big, strapping fellow, running around studying devilment, ought not to work. They ought to be made to work and to earn a living, and if you do not take them when they are young and make them earn their living they will not be worth hanging when they are grown, in all probability.

We listen too much to this effeminate business around here and all over the country. It is time we were wiping that out. Encourage people to work. I do not care to say anything about my experience. My father was a man of comfortable means, but he had me plow from sunup until sundown many a day, and that is about the best education I ever got, and I am proud of it. It served me in after life, and enabled me to know whether the men I employed were working or playing.

Then, Mr. President, we ought to say to the people, "You shall not strike and tie up the enterprises of this country." Strikes are becoming more noticeable all over this country. Down South we have not cared much about previous strikes of the longshoremen in New York, but this fall it tied up the cotton from going to Europe, and kept your wheat from going abroad, and a man in Ohio or South Carolina is as much interested in a strike in New York as he would be in a strike in his own State.

Not only that, but I deplore the tendency on the part of the States of recent years to look to Washington for everything. The governors of the States before long will be no more than chiefs of police of the States if the States continue to give up their rights. Congress is too anxious to assume rights that they ought not to take charge of, and the States are too ready to evade questions and shirk responsibilities that they ought to assume.

The legislatures in most of the States meet in January, I believe—certainly a large portion of them—and they ought to look after industrial legislation in this country, look after these people who rise up to despoil this Government, this red crowd, the I. W. W. crowd, and all of them, I do not care what they are. They ought to be put down there, and the States can get them quicker than we can get them here in Washington. They ought to put them on the roads and make them crack rock. This Government ought to send its agitating aliens back from whence they came.

Those are about my views on this bill, Mr. President. I think the Government ought to assist the railroads for a reasonable time. It is true they lost money. The roads were run down, the engines were broken, the cars gone to pieces, the tracks all lopsided, and things of that sort; but here in the last few months they have been making money. I believe they made something like twelve million or fourteen million dollars in the last month. They are beginning to make money. So I see no need to hurry to turn them back. Ask the President to give us a little more time and let us pass a sane law, a comprehensive law, and one that would be just to everyone.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I announced when we began consideration of the bill, it is the purpose of the committee, when the consideration of the bill draws near an end, to move to substitute this bill for the bill that has already passed the House. Accordingly I report from the Committee on Interstate Commerce the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that at the time I have indicated all after the enacting clause of the House bill be stricken out and Senate bill 3288 be substituted in its stead. I make the report for the purpose of permitting the House bill to go on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. MYERS. I offer the following amendment, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Strike out of the printed bill all of page 44 after the word "directors," in line 7, and before the word "the," in line 18; also all of page 44 after the word "prescribed," in line 20, and all of page 45 down to line 8.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the object of that amendment is to strike out of the bill that provision which authorizes the appointment on the board of directors of each road which incorporates under the provisions of this bill two employees of the road and two directors from the public. The bill as it is provides that on the board of directors of each road which incorporates under the provisions of this measure there shall be at least two directors from among the employees of the road and two directors to be appointed from the public by the transportation board. The bill provides that the affairs of each corporation shall be managed by a board of not less than 11 nor more than 15 directors. It provides that two of those directors shall be taken from among the employees of the road and two from the public, to be selected and appointed by the transportation board.

Mr. NORRIS. Does this amendment strike out that provision?

Mr. MYERS. It does.

Mr. NORRIS. So it would take four directors off?

Mr. MYERS. It would leave the number 11 or 15, as the case might be, but none would be taken from among the employees or from the public.

Mr. NORRIS. No directors from employees and no directors representing the public?

Mr. MYERS. That is correct. It would simply do away with two directors from the employees and two from the public. I am a believer in the good old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon doctrine that a man who owns a business has a right to run it; that a man who owns property has a right to control it. The only interest employees have in the management of railroads is to get adequate wages and fair working conditions. They should have them. I am in favor of that. But that is absolutely provided for elsewhere in this bill. That is taken care of. That is not overlooked by any means. The bill provides that there shall be a commission on wages and working conditions; also a number of regional boards of wages and working conditions. On each regional board and on the commission of wages and working conditions the employees have one half of the membership. One half of the representation is to come from among the employees.

Thus they are to have a voice in the fixing of wages and working conditions. The other half of the membership of the commissions and regional boards is to come from the owners of the roads. So the owners of the roads and the employees are to be equally represented. Each will have an equal voice. The employees are to have an equal voice with the owners in fixing their wages and working conditions. That is all right. That is taken care of. The bill provides that if a regional board can not agree on wages and working conditions, there shall be an appeal to the commission on wages and working conditions, and if it can not agree an appeal shall be taken to the transportation board, which shall settle the question. So I do not see any necessity for having people from among the public or people from among the employees on the board of directors of a road.

I believe the people who invest money in a business should have the privilege of conducting and operating it and, if it be engaged in interstate commerce, that such privilege should be subject to control and recognition by the United States Government.

We are providing by this bill that the roads are to be managed by their owners and to be conducted by them, subject to control, regulation, and supervision by the United States Government, and when that is provided for and when provision is made that the employees shall have an equal voice in the fixing of wages and working conditions and that the employees shall have adequate wages and fair working conditions and that revenue must be raised with which to defray the expense, I do not see the necessity of going any further in intermeddling or interfering with privately owned business.

I do not see the necessity of going any further with paternalism. I agree with very much of the substantive principles underlying the remarks just made by the esteemed Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I am opposed to Government interference with business any more than is necessary. I am very much opposed to paternalism, and I do not desire to carry it any further than is absolutely necessary. It does seem necessary, though, for the United States Government to take supervision of the railroads of the country. It seems necessary to provide adequate wages and fair working conditions and to make provision for an adequate return on investment and to provide against railroad strikes, which interfere with interstate commerce, tie up the business of the country, and bring freezing and starving conditions upon the people.

On account of the necessity of providing for these things I am willing to support this bill. In principle I really agree with the theory of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] that people and business interests and corporations should stand upon their own merit and sink or swim without help or interference from the Government. But the railroad business of the country has gotten into such condition that it seems necessary for the Government to take some supervision over it, to control in a general way its operations, and particularly to prevent nation-wide railroad strikes and, as a corollary, hand in hand with that, to provide adequate wages and fair working conditions for the employees.

But I do not want to go any further in that direction than is absolutely necessary. This idea of saying that two members of the board of directors of each road shall be employees and two more shall come from the public I think is unnecessary. I can see no necessity for it. Wages and working conditions are provided for in another way. They are provided through other bodies, the regional boards, the commission on wages and working conditions, and the transportation board. They are amply taken care of, and I can see no reason for having representation of employees and the public on the board of directors.

You may say it is to represent the employees. All the employees are interested in is getting adequate wages and fair working conditions. If they get them, they are satisfied, and they are provided for.

You may say that it is to represent the public. The public is taken care of by the entire bill. The whole theory of the bill is to take care of the public, and I do not see that it needs these two representatives on the board of directors.

I think the provision which I am aiming to strike out is an unwarranted interference with the right of private property. I am willing to interfere with private property where the general good requires, where it is necessary for the general welfare, where it is necessary for the preservation of peace and the welfare of the whole people, but no further. I have always understood that in order to be a director of a corporation one must be a stockholder. It should be so. If there are no stockholders among the employees, how are you going to make an employee a director? Are you going to take a man who is not a stockholder and make him a director? Are the two men to be selected from the public not to be stockholders? Are you going to take from the public men who are not stockholders and make them directors?

I think every man who is a director of a corporation should be a stockholder in the corporation. He should be directly interested, financially interested, in the corporation. I believe it right and proper to take the directors of a corporation from among the people who have their money invested in that corporation, who have their money at stake, and who are financially interested in the economical management of the corporation.

If I get three or four neighbors, or whatever may be the required number, to go in with me, and they each put in a little money and I put in most of the money, and we organize a national bank, it is under the control of the Federal Government, and properly so, because it is a Federal corporation. But would you have any right to say to me that I must make my janitor and my bookkeeper directors of that bank, men who have no financial interest whatever in its success, men who were only interested in doing their work and getting their wages? I say the people who put their money into the bank, the people who are stockholders, have a right to say who shall be the directors of the bank. The directors of a national bank should be chosen from among the stockholders—people who have put their money into the institution and are pecuniarily interested. Let the bank be under Federal control. That is right and well enough, because it is a Federal institution. Make the Federal control as rigid as you may see fit, but let the conduct of the business be in the hands of the men who supply the money.

I do not see any warrant for going to this extreme paternalism and saying who shall be directors of a corporation, even though engaged in interstate commerce. You may provide what the directors have to do and how they shall conduct their business, and what the penalty shall be if they do not conduct their business in the way prescribed by law, but let the people who put up the money name the directors.

My father was a farmer. He had a farm and always employed help on his farm—some negro and some white. But would it have been right for the law to have said that he must take into consultation the men whom he employed on the farm and must let them have a voice in directing the operations of that farm and of running it—let them say this field should be put in wheat and that should be put in corn?

There are men in the Senate who own cotton plantations. Would they want their employees to be made, as it were, directors of their plantations and to have a voice in the conduct of those plantations?

There are men in the Senate who own ranches and farms in the West. Would they think it right to have to take their foremen and other employees into joint management and let them be made directors or managers of their ranches? No; the men who furnish the money have the right to say how those ranches shall be run and how they shall be conducted. But if they undertake to conduct them in contravention of the public interest or contrary to the general welfare, then let some legislative body say that shall not be done.

I believe the bill would be just as good a bill, just as good for the employees and just as well for all, without this paternalistic interference with private business. I was not present at all the hearings held by the committee on the bill, but I understand that representatives of organized labor appeared before the committee when this provision was being considered and said they did not want representation of employees on the board of directors; said they were not interested in it, and, in fact, objected to it. If the representatives of organized labor do not want it, why should anybody else want it?

Therefore I hope my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senate adjourns to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, as I understand is contemplated, I desire to say that I have not completed my observations upon the bill, and if I can get recognition at the expiration of the morning hour, at 1 o'clock, I will resume my discussion of the measure that is pending.

Mr. MYERS. I did not know that I was interfering with the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin. I did not mean to get in ahead of him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; that is all right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I did not understand just how he reported the House bill awhile ago. As I studied about it, I wondered if he reported it simply striking out everything after the enacting clause and letting it go on the calendar in that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the way I reported it, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the Senate bill in lieu of the part stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Inserting the Senate bill as it was reported to the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I could not do otherwise, because there have been as yet no amendments made to the Senate bill. When I call up the House bill, if there have been amendments in the meantime made to the Senate bill, I shall change the motion so that the Senate bill as approved by the Senate will be substituted for the House bill. I know of no other way in which to get the matter into the conference properly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It occurred to me that the best way would be to withhold the reporting of the House bill until we had perfected the Senate bill, and then the Senator from Iowa no doubt could get unanimous consent to report the House bill with the Senate bill substituted as agreed to by the Senate. However, I do not know but that this probably can be done just as well.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope it can be done in that way even with the House bill on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suppose it will have to be done by unanimous consent or else we may be tied up with a parliamentary situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator will have no trouble about securing unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope not to have any trouble about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I got the impression that the Senator was reporting the House bill just as it was and that it was to go on the calendar in that way, and the country might get a wrong impression concerning the report of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think perhaps I did not express myself very well in making the report, but I intended to report it in the way I have suggested, and I think that is the proper way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I got the impression that the Senator stated that he intended hereafter to substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator withhold that motion just a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to make the request that if the bill does go over until to-morrow my amendment may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Montana will be printed and lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CUMMINS. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 10, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 9, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, from Whom cometh all wisdom, strength, courage, fortitude, right thinking therefore, and right living, we find ourselves as a people confronted with grave and momentous questions within our own borders and with our neighbors; hence we appeal to Thee, that our authorities in State and Nation may be able to solve them and establish peace within and without, loving mercy, doing justly, walking humbly with Thee. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, I transmit herewith the third annual report of the Council of National Defense for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 8 December, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ANTIDUMPING LEGISLATION.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10918, and, pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to arrange with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] for general debate. I have requests for 1 hour and 40 minutes, including the giving of 40 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho to discuss a question he asked unanimous consent to present yesterday, but was unable to do so because of the bill taking all day.

Mr. KITCHIN. So the gentleman does not wish to confine general debate to the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; except the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] wants 15 minutes to make a statement with reference to appropriations, and I think Mr. CRAGO wants about 15 minutes also, but nothing of a political matter.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Idaho has 40 minutes to make a speech on another subject, and the gentleman from Iowa has 15 minutes to make another speech, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has 15 minutes to make another speech, that will take 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and then the discussion will be confined absolutely to the bill. I ask that chiefly for the reason that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee unanimously favor this bill, and I would rather not see any politics come into the discussion.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose we have three hours, an hour and a half to a side, and let them talk on what they please. I am going to confine my remarks to the bill, and I suppose the gentleman is.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will also, and so will the gentleman. How much time does the gentleman say?

Mr. KITCHIN. An hour and a half to a side.

Mr. FORDNEY. That will give 50 minutes. We have got 1 hour and 10 minutes for these gentlemen on other matters, and that will only give me 10 minutes for discussion of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will give the gentleman some of my time for discussion of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like not more than 30 minutes. Has the gentleman requests for all of the time or could he yield a portion?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have requests for about 30 or 40 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield a portion of that time to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say this: As far as Mr. FRENCH is concerned I will yield 20 minutes of my time to him and 20 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. Giving 40 minutes to this side for a discussion of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let the gentleman yield the gentleman from Idaho 20 minutes, and I will yield him 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I just want to say that I think our chairman is sometimes a little bit too good natured and accommodating, his nature being exactly that way, in yielding time. I wish those Members who wish time to talk on other subjects would not insist always on the Ways and Means Committee giving it to them, because they are always charging it up to the Ways and Means Committee, and they could get their opportunity just as well at another time.

Mr. HULINGS. I want about 10 minutes this morning.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The result is to cut out some members of the Ways and Means Committee themselves. I feel obliged not to ask for any time in general debate for the reason so many Members come in and insist on having time given them by the chairman. I shall not, however, object. I would be very much better pleased, and I think the House would be better satisfied, if these requests came in at another time and not when the Committee on Ways and Means has a matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent——

Mr. FORDNEY. Would not the gentleman from North Carolina agree to make that an hour and forty-five minutes on a side, because the time agreed upon would only give me 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us have an hour and forty-five minutes for each side, and I will yield the gentleman 20 minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he could make arrangements to let me in there for about 10 minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will arrange to get the gentleman in under the five-minute rule, because we want to get through the discussion of this bill to-day. I will arrange to get the gentleman in under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULINGS. That does not suit me at all. I do not want to talk under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but we must confine this debate to the bill.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not know what the bill is. I want to talk on something that is quite as important as the bill, I think.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I will try to get the gentleman in under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not want to get in under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to three and a half hours, an hour and forty-five minutes to be controlled by himself and an hour and forty-five minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10918, the antidumping bill, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois took the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10918, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will be as brief as possible in my explanation of the purposes of this bill, after which, as far as I am able, I shall be glad to answer any questions that may be asked me by Members of the House.

The chief purpose of this bill is to prevent unfair competition from abroad when goods are sold here in competition with the products of this country. The bill provides that power be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate, to examine the books and papers and documents of any firm in any country of the world engaged in exporting to the United States to determine whether or not the price at which such firm's goods are sold in this country is at least equal to the price at which they are sold in the country of production, and upon refusal of a firm or person to give to an authorized representative of our Government the right to examine their books and documents the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to prohibit the importation into the United States of the goods of that firm or person until such information is given.

If it is found that a foreign company or corporation or individual is selling an article in this country at a price less than that at which it is sold in the country of production, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, through proper agents, to add an additional duty upon such imported article. In fact, the bill, if it becomes a law, gives power to the Secretary of the Treasury to prohibit importation in several ways: First, by a fine or imprisonment, or both, for a violation of the law. We do not object, and can not object, to a foreigner bringing goods into our country and selling them at a price equal to that charged for such goods in the country where they are made. If a foreign concern can make goods at a less price than we can, the difference in cost must be provided for in a tariff law. But no tariff rate that we have enacted or can enact will correctly anticipate the selling of goods in this country at a price less than their fair market value in the country of origin for the purpose of destroying an industry and competition in this country.

I will, if I have the time, call the attention of the House to several instances of unfair competition from abroad. We have upon our statute books what is known as the Sherman antitrust law, the purpose of which is to destroy or prevent monopoly in this country; to prevent large corporations from purchasing smaller ones, combining them, controlling prices, and then selling at an unfair profit to our people. But we have no law and we have no means for preventing concerns in a foreign country combining to sell their goods at a sacrifice in this country until competition here has been destroyed and thus control our markets at such prices as they wish to charge. I have in mind several instances of that kind which I can present to the House if I only have the time; among them are two presented by the now Attorney General, Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, while he was Alien Property Custodian. He points out in his annual report that the chemical manufacturers of this country, who with American capital have attempted to produce chemicals of various kinds, and especially those used in the manufacturing of dyestuffs, have been embarrassed and have been destroyed by unfair competition from abroad. He gives a full and clear explanation of the unfair competition by German manufacturers, giving the names of the firms, the amount of the capital invested, and their location.

As illustration of unfair practices Mr. Palmer points out two different chemicals—salicylic acid and oxalic acid. He shows that American capital became invested in the production of salicylic acid at a time when such acid was selling in Germany, in round numbers, at 30 cents per pound. The import duty then was 5 cents per pound. Yet German manufacturers sold in our market, in competition with the American-made salicylic acid, at 25 cents a pound, paying 5 cents a pound duty; in other words, selling what would yield to them, less the tariff, 20 cents a pound when the price in Germany was 30 cents a pound, until our manufacturers closed their doors. Then the price went up to 30 cents and beyond that.

He points out, again, that there were five factories in this country—three owned by American capital, largely by Pennsylvania residents—manufacturing oxalic acid, which was selling at 6½ cents per pound. When the three American manufactories started up the Germans cut the price to 4.7 cents per pound, which price remained for some time. Finally the price was reduced to 2.2 cents per pound, until the three American factories closed their doors. Then the price was put back by the Germans to 9 cents per pound and finally lowered to 7½ cents per pound, where the price remained for some time. When the war came on the three American factories again opened their doors and began operations. The Alien Property Custodian discovered that one of these factories was German-owned and a branch of a large corporation in Germany, and that the reduction of the price was carried on by the German institution, and that when the institutions of American ownership closed their doors and could no longer produce the article at the price obtaining the price by the German manufacturers went back to 9 cents a pound—higher than it had been before our people began the production of the articles in this country.

I have a letter from Mr. Dow, of the Dow Chemical Co., of Midland, Mich., a town about 20 miles from my home. The Dow Chemical Co., of Michigan, is a very large institution at the present time, making chemicals from salt brine. Mr. Dow was forced to meet a very bitter and determined fight against unfair German competition aimed to drive him out of the market. Upon request he gave me the details of that fight. The letter is as follows:

THE DOW CHEMICAL CO.,
Midland, Mich., July 18, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: In reply to your letter of July 14, our experience with the German bromine trust was somewhat as follows:

Fifteen or sixteen years ago a German who spoke good English came into my office and introduced himself as a director in the Deutsche-Bromkonvention (Bromine Trust), and explained that the Bromkonvention was a subsidiary of the Kali Syndicate (potash syndicate). He elaborated somewhat fully on this point, explaining that the Prussian Government was a party to the potash syndicate and that the Bromkonvention was to the same extent a government institution. After some further preliminary remarks he stated that they had secured evidence that we had exported bromides. He did not complain that we had exported them to Germany, but that we had exported them out of the United States. I replied that I knew of no law in the United States that prevented Americans from exporting bromides, whereupon this German stated that he knew there was no United States law, but that he had come all the way from Stassfurt, Germany, to tell me that the Bromkonvention would not permit me to export bromides, and that if I persisted they would put 2 pounds of bromides in the United States for every 1 pound that we exported. I stated that we could make bromides just as cheap as he could, to which he replied that price was no consideration and had no bearing on the subject; that they would put 2 pounds in here for every 1 pound we exported, entirely irrespective of price.

I did not give the matter very serious consideration, and we continued to export bromides.

Some considerable time after this visit a big consignment of bromides was landed in New York and distributed by the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Co. at 15 cents a pound, the price in Germany being approximately 49 cents per pound and the import duty 25 per cent ad valorem. From this you will see that the price they received probably did not pay for import duty, transportation, and distribution expenses. I do not remember the American price at that time, but it was somewhere near 30 cents. Of course, many jobbers of pharmaceutical chemicals availed themselves of the opportunity of stocking up on a standard pharmaceutical product like potassium bromide, and, if I remember correctly, there was no method by which we could secure from the Government information in regard to the quantity imported. But almost simultaneously with the arrival of this bromide in the United States the same German referred to above visited one of our best customers, the Mallinckrodt Chemical Co., and Mr. Mallinckrodt wired me that he was there and asked me to join them in a conference, which I did, but would not agree to desist making exports. The Germans sold all the bromides they could at 15 cents per pound, and when they could sell no more at that figure reduced it to 14 cents, then to 13 cents, and I think the lowest offer made was 11 cents. This extended over a period of about three and three-fourths years, but in the meantime we had entirely ceased selling bromides in the United States and confined our efforts solely to the foreign market, and during the last year of that period we sold more bromides in Germany than the Germans sold in the United States, and it netted the Dow Co. very much more than the American price. Such a large quantity of bromides was brought into the United States during this time that for approximately three years thereafter there was no market in America for bromides. We, however, continued to sell moderate amounts abroad and have never desisted, and at the time Germany entered into war we had the usual amount of foreign trade, which suddenly increased to large proportions when German competition dropped out.

The only thing that prevented the Dow Chemical Co. from being eliminated from the bromide business was the high tariff, which handicapped the Germans to such an extent that they ultimately gave up the fight. If we had been less persistent and had dropped out, everybody would have said that the Americans could not compete with the Germans in this line and would have believed it sincerely.

The above are the main facts in regard to our bromide fight with the Germans, and I think more or less well known by most of the manufacturing chemists.

Very truly, yours,

HERBERT H. DOW.

I mention this instance, gentlemen, to show the unfair competition that some of our manufacturers in this country must meet.

The Alien Property Custodian points out that a chemical company in Germany—and you will find that statement on page 26 of the Alien Property Custodian's report for the year 1918—started in 1865 with five employees. That one firm in Germany to-day has a plant on the Rhine with one mile and a half frontage on the river and with 500 acres of a plant. In 1912 it employed 7,680 laborers, 307 chemists, 374 foremen, 74 engineers; had 30,000 horsepower and 42 miles of railroad within the limits of the plant. It made chemicals we purchased from Germany prior to the war, but many of which are now being made by American manufacturers. The world's production of dyestuffs before the war was $100,000,000, 75 per cent of which was made in Germany. We consumed from 15 to 25 per cent of these dyes. We must come in competition with those great corporations when once again trade relations are fully restored between this country and Germany. They started in, as I say, with a small capital, but the Alien Property Custodian points out that that combination to-day has $400,000,000 invested in the manufacture of chemicals in Germany.

Now, gentlemen, we are making dyestuffs in this country, we are making chemicals of various kinds in this country, that we did not make before the war. This bill will do much to protect those institutions if it is enacted into law and properly enforced. It will protect our American manufacturers against unfair competition. There is no other purpose in the bill. It will not permit a foreigner in any line of industry to come to our markets and sell his goods here at a less price than he sells them for in the country where they are made.

Canada has such a law to-day upon her statute books and strictly enforces it. If I had the time I could point out to you many instances where American manufacturers have attempted to sell goods in Canada at reduced prices and have been prohibited from doing so; have been directed to take their goods out of Canada or rebill them, reinvoice them, at their actual selling price in this country, pay an additional duty, and a penalty; either that or take the goods from Canada and cease further importations to Canada.

I have a statement which aims to explain the various provisions and sections of the bill, and will insert that statement in my remarks at this point:

The term "antidumping" is used in the title of this act as it indicates at once the popular understanding of the measure.

SECTION 1.

MERCHANDISE.

Imported merchandise is either free or dutiable at specific or ad valorem rates. In the act the special duty applies to "merchandise" without limitation, including within its provision merchandise free, specific, and ad valorem. Merchandise sold at a fair price might be entitled to importation into the United States free of duty, but when such merchandise is sold at less than its fair market value and no equalizing duty can be assessed, its entrance into the commerce of the United States might become disastrous to the producer of like merchandise in the United States. For this reason all classes of imported merchandise have been made subject to the special duties under the dumping act. This results in the equalization of the cost to the importer to the price of the American producer, providing that the action of Congress was correct in placing the article on the free list.

The bill should include such merchandise as is now assessed under the tariff act with specific rates. Specific rates do not, if their effect is proper, do more than equalize the cost of the foreign product to that of the domestic. Without the imposition of a special duty on goods subject to specific duties, unfair competition by reason of sale at a dumping price would bring imported merchandise into this market at a lower price, which might injure and destroy competition by an American produced article.

THE CLASS OR KIND.

The class or kind subject to special duties will be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury after investigation and comparison of the class or kind produced in the United States. This provision will make a definite classification for the appraising officer and the collector as to the imported merchandise upon which special duties shall be levied.

In the preparation and determination of the class or kind the Secretary of the Treasury will have to avail himself of the expert knowledge of the merchandise customs examiners and other Treasury investigating officers. The merchandise examiners form a body of experts, familiar with merchandise conditions throughout the world. This body of experts, on account of their long experience, would be best fitted to advise the Secretary of the Treasury. In our opinion it would be very difficult, and only after a long lapse of time possible, to build up a new force to determine comparability without using this splendid nucleus of expert knowledge.

Merchandise may be of a kind or class identical to a class or kind made in the United States, but not comparable from a dumping standpoint. To illustrate: A high-grade china might fall into the class or kind that includes low-grade china, semiporcelain, or earthenware, but if it is art china, not made in the United States, it would not be in competition. On the other hand, dinner ware manufactured in Limoges, France, or its imitation made in Japan, would come on the market in direct competition with the same kind of dinner ware made in the United States. Hotel ware also comes into competition with American hotel ware.

DEFINITIONS.

Sections 2 and 3 explain themselves. Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 are definitions defining the terms "foreign home values," "values to countries other than the United States," "cost of production," and "sales price," thereby saving considerable phraseology and repetition in referring to their application later on.

SECTIONS 4 AND 5.

FOREIGN HOME VALUE—VALUE TO COUNTRIES OTHER THAN THE UNITED STATES.

Foreign home value is the first value to ascertain. If that value can be secured and the export price to the United States is maintained at that level there is no dumping, provided the value in the home country is the open value to all and not a restricted, conditional, or special value. Any deviation by lowering of price for sales to the United States would indicate and establish dumping. The value to countries other than the United States, in the absence of a foreign home value, should be the first alternative. It is quite manifest that the price at which merchandise is freely offered and openly sold to all countries other than the United States must constitute a fair return in value for the product sold. The provision to section 4 is important. Merchandise may not be sold in the country of production for home consumption, and therefore the price to countries other than the United States would be resorted to if it exists. In such event, if a concession in the form of rebate or the nonimposition of import duties is made, the provision in section 4 will make it mandatory to add to the export price any unpaid or rebate import duties to establish what may be termed a constructive home market value. This does not apply to an excise tax, for such tax has no relation to the value in connection with dumping.

PACKING CHARGES.

To the foreign home value or the value to countries other than the United States, the cost of packing and packing charges are added. In comparing either of these values as against the export value to the United States, packing charges must be taken into consideration. In some lines of goods their relation to the value is very high. When an export price to the United States is compared with the foreign home value or the value to countries other than the United States, packing and packing charges must be either included in both values or, if not, eliminated from both.

WHOLESALE QUANTITIES.

Under the present law market value is found in the usual wholesale quantities of the home country. It will be noted under this section that market value is found in the foreign country on the basis of the usual wholesale quantities of the same kind or class as sold to the United States. The purpose in substituting the wholesale quantities in the United States instead of the wholesale quantities in the foreign home market is to obviate the determination of value in retail quantities, which may be the wholesale quantity in which ordinarily bought and sold in the foreign market of production or sale. To illustrate: Books are sold in England in quantities of probably a dozen direct to the bookseller. The price in such quantity is far in excess of the price at which the publisher will sell in usual wholesale quantities to markets other than the home market. It can scarcely be contended that the price at which he sells the far greater part of his production is a dumping price simply because the merchandise is to be exported, and that the fair wholesale price is in the limited quantities in which sold in the home market.

In many countries, owing to the proximity of the market of production to the place of consumption and the absence of the jobbers as known in this country, the purchasers buy in extremely limited quantities. It is quite usual in England for the manufacturer to sell directly to the consumer in quantities as low as one. It would be very unjust to take the price at which the manufacturer sells one, which may be the usual wholesale quantity of the country of production or sale, and compare it with the price at which he sells the far greater part of his product to the United States, and because of the higher price at which he sells the one, assess a special duty under the dumping act, where, in fact, no dumping has actually occurred and the price for export is a fair market price in the quantities in which sold to the United States.

SECTION 6.

The "cost of production" defined in this section is the third alternative. The foreign home value is first. If none exists, then the foreign value to countries other than the United States is resorted to. In the absence of these two values, the only method left to establish a value is through the medium of the cost of production, which involved the determination of cost of material, labor, and general expense of the merchandise similar in material and production or manufacture. The material, labor, and general expense are definite factors to establish as pertaining to a particular manufacture or article, but the addition of profit may involve dumping. The manufacturer in the foreign country, desiring to get into the American market, may make a very low price; he may even sell without any profit at all, or he may sell at a price even lower than the bare cost of production. Consequently it must be ascertained whether in addition to his costs he has added a fair profit. Section 5 provides that the profit to be added to the costs of material, labor, and general expenses is the average profit of manufacturers in the market of production producing articles from like material by similar methods of manufacture or production. In this manner the constructive home-market value is reached, it being assumed that manufacturers selling in the home market must add to their costs a legitimate profit to establish their selling prices in the home market. To illustrate: A particular style of ladies' handbag made of leather may be manufactured in France and sold only to the United States. No market value existing in the home market or for countries other than the United States, the cost of production must be established. The factors of cost can be ascertained from the books of the manufacturer, but to determine the amount of profit that should be legitimately added to make a fair home-market value the investigator would have to turn to the leather manufacturers in France, who, although they did not make the particular style of handbag for ladies, or possibly not any kind of handbag, would be making leather goods of like material and construction to the leather bag, and their manufacturing profits would be added to the cost established.

SECTION 7.

(A) SALES PRICE.

The true market value for home consumption or to countries other than the United States, or in the absence of these values, the cost of production having been found, such result must be compared with the sales price to the United States to establish whether the special dumping duty is to be assessed. This sales price must be the true price, and not a disguised price or simply an invoiced price. The special duties being 100 per cent of the difference between the sales price and the home-market value, and the import duties only a fractional part, the importer would be quite willing to invoice at the higher price, in order to avoid payment of a special duty. The price to the person in the United States buying the merchandise abroad on the face of it would appear to be the true price. However, if the person in the United States had an interest in the business abroad, or if the business abroad was one and the same with that in the United States, although both under separate entities and incorporated under the laws of the two countries, it can readily be seen that almost any price could be agreed upon as a sales price and the merchandise actually billed and paid at that price, and any losses adjusted at the end of the year by transfer of moneys, entirely unknown to the officials charged with the imposition of the special duties. For that reason the definition in A is set forth, limiting one of the sales prices to the person in the United States only if such person in the United States has no financial or other interest in the business of the shipper. The purpose for this exception is to forestall a practice whereby a foreign manufacturer may seemingly sell at a price which is fair home-market value, but subsequently make adjustments by credits and debits in his books for any loss incurred through the sale of the merchandise at prices less than the invoice value plus charges incurred in placing the merchandise in the hands of the buyer.

(B) SALES PRICE.

This subsection shows how the appraiser in instances where the person in the United States has an interest in the foreign business can disregard the apparent sales price and take the sales price of the importer in the United States, and after subtracting from that price the expenses incurred in placing the merchandise in the market of the United States will reach the real sales price at which the merchandise entered into competition with comparable merchandise in the United States.

(C) SALES PRICE.

This subsection defines how the sales price shall be found when the merchandise is shipped to the United States consigned or otherwise than by purchase. It can be readily seen that the manufacturer in the foreign country consigning his merchandise to the United States may consign on his consular invoice at the full foreign market value, let us say $1, and after the arrival of the merchandise in the United States dispose of it really at 90 cents or any lower price he desires. This is a condition which has never been provided against or obviated by any dumping law, and is the most important of all.

SECTION 8.

DATE OF SALE.

The present law provides that the market value is to be determined as of the date of exportation to the United States. Under this act provision is made that the foreign home value for goods actually purchased is to be found on the date of sale, distinguished from the present tariff law as on the date of exportation. For goods coming into the United States secured otherwise than by purchase or on consignment under this definition foreign market value is taken on the date of exportation, as there would be no date of sale, and the date of exportation would be the only date that it entered into competition.

Merchandise is rarely shipped on the date of its purchase. Shipment takes place a week or two or six months thereafter. The merchandise may not be in existence at the time of purchase, but to be manufactured for future delivery. During the time elapsing between date of purchase and the date of shipment the foreign home value may change, but to what extent no one knows. It may be higher; it may be lower. The importer in the United States, in order to conduct his business intelligently, must know very closely what the merchandise is to cost. If by reason of a change in price special duties are to be imposed it will be impossible for any importer to do business. The imposition of special duties between the price at the time of sale and the price six months hence will mean that the importer is not buying his merchandise at the price set at the time of purchase but at some unknown price in the future.

To establish whether dumping has actually occurred necessitates a comparison between the sales price and the foreign home value. This determination should be made by comparing the two values on the same date. The date of exportation has not been adopted, in view of the desirability of determining the relative prices for export and for home consumption on the same date.

SECTION 9.

The special duty is the difference between the sales price and the values provided for in this act on the date of purchase and sale. This in some instances may lead to the incongruous position that a special duty is imposed with the price on date of exportation lower than the market value on date of sale. It was originally contemplated to incorporate a proviso in section 9 that whenever the values on date of exportation were lower or equal to the sales price that no special duties shall be imposed, but upon further consideration it is deemed advisable to leave it out. Dumping occurs when merchandise is sold at less than its fair market value at the time of the transaction. A further argument in favor of the imposition of the special duties without regard to the market value condition on date of exportation is the fact that, as a rule, merchandise is produced previous to the exportation, and that merchandise manufactured in the United States on the same date must have relative costs similar to those in the foreign market.

The reduction of a price is usually the reflection of the lowering of some element of cost and should have no effect on merchandise which may be quoted on the date of exportation at a lower price as a result of the existence of merchandise created at a higher cost or to be created on the basis of lower cost. To further illustrate: Merchandise manufactured coincidently in the domestic and foreign markets; the difference of costs are presumably equalized by the imposition of an import duty. Involved, however, in the transaction in the foreign market is the element of sale at lower than the proper market price. For that purpose a dumping duty is provided. If the imposition of the dumping duty is not enacted the merchandise produced in the United States is meeting the unfair competition resulting from the dumping.

If in the judgment of Congress it is deemed desirable that no dumping duties shall be imposed in the event of a reduction in the market value between date of sale and the date of exportation, a proviso should be added to section 7, as follows:

Provided, That whenever the values on date of exportation are equal to or less than the sales price the special duty provided shall not be levied or collected.

SECTION 10.

This is the authority for the appraiser, or the person acting as such, to find either one of the three different values and the sales price. This authority is necessary, as the present law does not authorize the appraiser to find other than the market value on the date of exportation.

SECTION 11.

This authorizes the appraiser to find the sales price after the merchandise has been imported. This provision is most important, as without it dumping can not be prevented.

Sections 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 are authority for the collector to assess the special duty and authority in cases of appeal, by either the importer or the collector, and for the general appraiser or the boards of general appraisers to find the particular kind of value provided for in this act. The already created tribunals for customs appeal are under this act authorized to determine the necessary values, and the machinery for this is set forth in practically the same phraseology as now appears in our present tariff act, paragraph M, section 3.

SECTION 17.

This section reaches the importer, the only person that can be reached, and denies him the right to import if his shipper or manufacturer refuses to open his books. To forbid the foreigner to send the merchandise to the United States might involve this country in serious controversy. Investigating officers are at present not clothed with the proper authority. Many foreign shippers do not respect nor accede to the request of a properly authorized Government officer that the papers and books be placed before him for inspection to ascertain facts necessary for proper appraisement.

The inability of investigators abroad to compel foreign manufacturers and shippers to open their books and give true values has been responsible for a large percentage of undervaluations. Where duty is based on value it is readily understood that if such value can not be ascertained, either by reason of an insufficient number of investigating officers abroad or through lack of authority for investigating officer to demand an inspection of the records of the sale, the administration of the law is greatly hampered. There are many instances where foreign shippers or manufacturers have refused to give the United States Government any information as to their foreign home value or values to countries other than the United States. As a result of such refusal no penalty has been imposed. If the merchandise were stopped at the border or turned back from the customhouse, the foreign shipper would soon realize that he will either comply with the laws of the United States or discontinue seeking business in the United States. At present our foreign investigators are given only what the foreign shipper desires to give them, and their work, for the reason that there is no way to enforce their demands, is very hard.

Along these lines a speech reported to have been made before the German chamber of commerce is inserted for information. Appraising officers say, whether this speech was actually made or not, that it expresses exactly the attitude of the German manufacturer or shipper and the attitude of many manufacturers and shippers in other foreign countries.

SECTION 18.

This is the same as 17, differing only in that it gives authority to secure the sales price in the United States. It is fully as important as section 17.

SECTION 19.

The present law requires that the purchase price be set forth on consular invoices where the goods are actually purchased and the market value where the goods are consigned. For the purpose of this act it will be necessary for the foreign exporter to place upon the invoice, in addition to the purchase price, either the home value or the value to countries other than the United States at date of sale, and, in the absence of either of these values, the cost of production at date of production. Such statement on the invoice will greatly expedite the passing of the goods and the return of the invoice by the appraiser.

SECTION 22.

We, the committee, believe that the special agents or other officers having expert knowledge of the administration of customs laws should be limited as far as practicable to those in the service, going out of the service and appointing from the civil-service list when such officers are not available. This will lead to better administration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, would it disturb the gentleman to ask him a question right there for information?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is rather a complicated piece of machinery that is set up in this bill. I would like to have stated the method of determining the method of unfair rates, and upon whom that responsibility rests, and how it operates, or will operate, under this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. We called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and he very kindly permitted us to have the benefit of experts employed by the Government in the customs offices in New York, men who have been in the employ of the Government for 30 years, and who are very thoroughly conversant with the facts that would be brought out if this bill becomes a law. The bill gives the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint proper officers to send abroad to any country in the world to investigate books of foreign firms and see at what price certain goods are sold in the country where they are made, and on their failing to give our representatives that information the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to prohibit the importation of that company's goods until we do get that information. Then if goods are imported into this country contrary to the provisions of this law, and the importer knowingly violates the law, he makes himself liable to fine and imprisonment. If he pays rebates contrary to law, he subjects himself to fine or imprisonment. Power is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to prohibit, as I have said, the importation of such goods made by people violating the law or refusing to give us the necessary information or the right to examine their books or their records.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There has been quite a good deal of statement and complaint to the effect that American manufacturers did this same thing.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That they have marked their goods here at one price, and in order to get into the markets of foreign countries they have reduced the price there far below the price in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Have any of the foreign countries other than Canada, as mentioned by the gentleman, taken any steps providing for the inspection of the books of our manufacturers?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Australia and New Zealand and the Union of South Africa have enacted such laws, but I believe no other country. I have frequently heard that American manufacturers often sell abroad cheaper than they sell at home; but there is less opportunity for the American manufacturer to sell abroad at a lower price than he sells here, as compared with the foreigner, because of the difference between our cost of production and the cost of production abroad. Our goods cost more on account of our higher labor cost—which is higher than the labor cost of any country in the world—and therefore we have less opportunity to sell at a sacrifice price abroad than foreigners have to sell at a sacrifice price here. But I believe this has often been done by our manufacturers, and we know of many instances where foreigners have practiced the same thing here. In order to run their establishment at the lowest possible cost of production, manufacturers find the best way is to run the entire plant at full blast. Many times a manufacturer finds himself with a surplus of goods on hand, made under those conditions. His output in this country exceeds the demand for his product here and he finds his warehouse filled to overflowing. In such a situation there is but one of two things to do, either to close down until he works off that surplus product or to dump the goods somewhere in the world at a sacrifice in price.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Could not the American manufacturer also reduce the price at home as well as abroad, and let the American people get the benefit of that surplus as well as the foreigner?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I will say to the gentleman that once upon a time Mr. Schwab came before the Committee on Ways and Means when our honored Member, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, was a member of that committee. Mr. CLARK said to Mr. Schwab: "I understand you sell steel rails abroad cheaper than you sell them in the United States. Is that true?" Mr. Schwab said, "No; that is not true." He said: "There had not for 10 long years been a pound of steel rails sold by an American manufacturer in any steel-producing country in the world except some sold by our company, the Bethlehem Steel Co., to northwestern Canada, for which we received $2 per ton more than we received in this country."

Then the question came up, If there was a reduction in the price, why not first reduce it to the home consumer? He replied: "Our best market in the world is at home within a certain zone, in the territory surrounding our industry, and if we can not sell to the people in that territory at a profit we can not sell to any people in the world at a profit. Therefore we must maintain a price at which we can obtain a profit where we must look for the major portion of the sale of our product. So we can not reduce the price to our home customers and hope ever to make a dollar in the business. For that reason we maintain the price to our own people at home and dump our surplus product abroad in order to keep running and employ our labor and manufacture at the lowest possible cost."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then, the long and short of it is that they do sell higher here than they sell abroad—our own American manufacturers?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not say that. I say we can not do that in Canada, we can not do that in Australia, we can not do that in any country that has an antidumping law, because they do not permit it if they know we are selling at sacrifice prices.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would the gentleman have any objection to incorporating in this bill a kind of mutuality, that whereas we forbid others to dump here we forbid our own manufacturers to dump elsewhere?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; we can not control export prices, nor should we try to. I have said that although we have to-day the Sherman antitrust law, which forbids combinations in this country to exact unfair profits from our people, we have no law whatever upon our statute books that protects our people against foreign combinations to put our industries out of business and then put the prices as high as they choose, as has been so fully set out and so clearly demonstrated by the report of the Alien Property Custodian, which I call to your attention and ask you to read.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The principal purpose of this bill, as I understand it from a very slight examination—for I was not able to participate with the committee in its consideration—is to protect the manufacturers or producers in the United States against "dumping" by those who produce similar articles in other countries, is it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is the sole purpose of the bill.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does the gentleman place the construction on section 9, on page 5, that where articles are exported from other countries to the United States, which articles are not produced at all in the United States, the purchaser in this country would be required to pay a price equal to the price paid in the country from which the product is exported?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; but the invoice price is fixed for the purpose of collecting the correct amount of revenue on these imported goods.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. In that connection, there are many articles imported into the United States and consumed here which are not produced in the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Or if produced here are only produced in inadequate quantities?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Some of these same articles are shipped from the country which produces them and sold in other countries at prices lower than the domestic price. Now, under this bill would the American purchaser be required to pay the higher price which the domestic level suggests, or would he get the article at the lower price level at which the article is sold in other countries?

Mr. FORDNEY. My understanding is that the bill attempts in no way to fix the price on a noncompetitive product except for the purpose of collecting revenue. Revenue should be collected on noncompetitive products at the price for which they sell in the country of production, not the price for which it might be sold to foreign countries. That is for the purpose of collecting the correct amount of revenue due to our Government. For that purpose this measure would compel them to show on the invoice the price at which the article is sold in the country where it is produced.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I call the attention of the gentleman to this point, because I am not sure whether it would be fair to the business of this country, which purchases from abroad articles and commodities that we do not produce here for the purpose of manufacturing or otherwise consuming them, when it finds those articles are being exported from the country of production and sold at a lower price than the domestic price, to be compelled to pay the domestic price while other countries which purchase the article pay the lower price.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the purpose of the bill is not that at all. Suppose we are importing an article like coffee from Brazil. We do not produce coffee in the United States. Suppose we find that Brazil is selling coffee in Brazil at 5 cents a pound, but in some foreign country at 4 cents a pound. If it was an article which paid duty—which coffee does not—then we would compel them to place on the invoice of the shipment to this country the price at which the article is sold in Brazil, in order that we might collect a duty on 5 cents a pound instead of on 4 cents. But the bill in no way attempts to fix the price at which noncompetitive articles may be sold in this country, because if they are noncompetitive articles then we want them sold to our people at the very lowest possible price for which we can buy them.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Just one word further, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Take the case of coffee. Suppose Brazil sold coffee in her domestic markets at 8 cents a pound. Suppose she prices it to the American purchaser at 7 cents a pound. Suppose she prices it to a purchaser in England and other countries at 6 cents a pound. Under that state of facts, when we apply section 9 of this bill, the American purchaser would have to pay, because of the revenue proposition, the difference between the price in Brazil and the price at which it is sold at home, although he ought to be allowed to purchase it at the price at which it is sold in England and other countries.

Mr. FORDNEY. I assume that if there was an instance where an article was sold in this country at a price less than that at which it is sold in the country where it is produced, if it is a noncompetitive product, we would in no way attempt to interfere with the price, but I do not believe any foreigner will sell his goods here at lower prices than at home if he has no competition here, which would be the case in noncompetitive articles.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. Would the gentleman from Tennessee have any reason to apprehend that a foreign producer sending his product into this country, where there was no competition, where he had an exclusive field for his product, would be inclined to charge less for it here under those conditions than he would charge at home?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the chances are that he would not sell for any less than he could sell at home, because he would enjoy full control of the market in this country on a noncompetitive product. He competes only with his own neighbor or some man from a foreign land.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman stated that where the article is noncompetitive—that is, where the article that is imported is not produced in the United States—this bill does not apply. That, of course, was the intention of the committee, but in reading the bill very carefully I think the committee omitted one very important amendment which should go into the bill to carry out the gentleman's idea.

Take coffee; coffee is free. If they are selling coffee in Brazil for 10 cents a pound and they offer to sell it to our people for 8 cents a pound, we ought not to object, because it is a noncompetitive article. Tea is the same way.

Mr. FORDNEY. And rubber.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think to cure that I would suggest this amendment, which the gentleman and the committee can think of: Add to section 9, page 5, these words, "Provided, That this section shall not apply to any article the like of which is not produced in substantial quantities in the United States."

That would cure it and do what the committee intended.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know that there is any serious objection to that amendment, but the bill has been carefully prepared, and I believe that we should be very careful about amendments.

But this is the point: I do not know of any article imported into this country, noncompetitive, which is not on the free list. Tea, coffee, and rubber are articles that we do not produce in the United States and are on the free list and would not be affected by this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the bill states in section 9—and I did not notice that in committee—that "whenever merchandise, whether dutiable or free, is exported to the United States," and so forth. The word "free" ought to go out.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not think that language ought to go out, and for this reason: There are many articles that are admitted free of duty that are competitive, and if they are competitive products, then the principle should apply and the penalty should apply if the articles are sold at a less price in this country than in the country where they are produced.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Have we not an antidumping law in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. We have an antidumping law, enacted in 1916 in the revenue bill, but that law is inoperative, for the reason that a conspiracy must be proven between the exporter and the importer to lower the price for the purpose of destroying or injuring an industry in this country. That is impossible. You might be an importer of an article from abroad and the man in the foreign country offer you goods at a certain price. You know nothing about what the price of the article is in the country where it is produced. You buy because the price is attractive. It could not be proven that you had entered into a conspiracy to destroy an industry simply because you purchase the goods cheap. Therefore in not a single instance, so I am informed, has the law been enforced since it was enacted in 1916. It is not obligatory on the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce that law. This bill, if it becomes a law, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed either to collect the extra amount of duty under the penalty imposed or prohibit the importation of the article altogether until a satisfactory settlement can be made by the importer or exporter—the foreigner. That is exactly what Canada does to-day.

I will give you an illustration on that point: There is a pottery manufacturer in New Jersey making lavatory or toilet stools, which are sold in this country at $5 each. He had a large surplus on hand and he sent a large consignment to a firm in Canada at $3 apiece. Immediately the Canadian Government sent a man to this pottery in New Jersey for the purpose of examining the books as to the price these articles were sold for in this country. The proprietor refused to let him see the books. The agent said, "I am going to the hotel and will be there until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning; if you want to see me you will find me there."

Late in the evening the manufacturer received a telegram from the party in Canada to whom he sold the goods, saying, "I am forbidden to unload the goods; what is the trouble?" He called on the agent at the hotel, and the agent said, "You will take your goods out of Canada or let me examine your books, because we are under the impression you are selling in Canada at a price less than you sell in the United States." The manufacturer admitted that that was true.

Then he was given the privilege of paying the duty and 50 per cent penalty, or taking his goods out of Canada and staying out.

That is very strict, very rigid, very proper, and a good protection to the industry in Canada. That is exactly what this bill does. It places the power in the Government of the United States to do that very thing and prevent unfair competition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the manufacturer from selling his goods at any price he wishes to in a foreign country, provided the foreign country does not complain about the price?

Mr. FORDNEY. He can sell his goods at any price obtainable, but they can not sell goods in our market for the purpose of destroying an industry here by selling at a price less than they sell for where the goods are produced. That is the whole gist of the argument in this bill.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am trying to get set right on the question I raised awhile ago and which I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] takes the same view that I do. Section 9 in this bill says:

That whenever merchandise whether dutiable or free is exported to the United States of the class or kind provided for in this act.

Here is the opening language of the Canadian law which I think is most drastic:

In the case of articles imported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada—

There is a difference in the language as there is in some other provisions in the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. There are other provisions covering that same language, but it only applies when made applicable to dutiable and free goods when the free goods are competitive products. For instance, to-day wool is an article on the free list but produced in this country, and is a competitive product.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. One further question in that connection. The gentleman expressed it as his opinion that this bill applies only to imports that are competitive. To what extent would a domestic product have to be produced in this country to be considered competitive?

Mr. FORDNEY. The bill provides in proper language in any reasonable or appreciable quantity. That is to say, an article made only occasionally in this country, or in a negligible quantity, perhaps, would not be considered, but that is left somewhat to the discretion of the Treasury officials. I think the language of the bill leaves it that way. I hope when this bill comes to a vote there will not be a man on either side of the House who will vote against it, because I think it is absolutely equitable and it is nonpartisan, and there should be no politics in the matter at all. Its only purpose is to protect the industries of the country against unfair competition. All that the industries of this country can ask in the way of a duty on an article subject to import duty is a duty sufficiently high to offset the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. That is all that any manufacturer in this country ought to ask and that is all he is entitled to. If he is put on a fair basis with his foreign competitor, he ought to be able to control the markets of the United States as against the foreigner, especially so when conditions prejudiced as at present exist between this country and some foreign countries.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The provisions of section 9 are, in brief, this, as I understood the gentleman, that where an article is to be sold in this country at a less price than it is sold in the producing country, an equalization shall be made by way of the imposition of a duty to equal a price at which it is sold in the country producing it. Is that correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Would not the effect of that be—and I am asking the question for information—to increase the price in this country to the consumer?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. I wish to cite instances related by the Alien Property Custodian. He is a very high-class gentleman, for whom I have the highest regard, Hon. Mitchell Palmer, a good Democrat, as you gentlemen know, a long-time Member of this House. I have faith in the man's good intentions and in his honesty and fairness. In his report he points out the necessity for protection to our institutions because of unfair competition, and he cites that unfair competition. He sets forth fully that the industries in this country were destroyed by unfair competition from German manufacturers, and he calls the attention of the country to the fact that those institutions have been entirely undisturbed by the war; that they have $400,000,000 invested in those factories running to-day, or ready to run, and anxious—more so than ever before—to dump their products upon our markets and control our markets for the reason, more than at any time in the past, that Germany needs money. Germany's public debt to-day is 55 per cent of her total wealth, all caused by this war. She is in greater distress financially than any other people or any country in the world, and therefore she will seek our markets and will resort to anything and everything to control our markets and stifle competition here, and once in control will exact from our people high prices, as in the past.

Mr. DEWALT. Granting the effectiveness of the gentleman's argument, and granting the necessity for some such protection, is not the result precisely what I have tried to state, that when you impose the duty on the imported article here to equalize the price, namely, impose a duty equal to the price at which the article is sold in the foreign country, that instead of reducing the price here the effect will be to raise the price to the consumer in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. That will be true if the foreigner after stifling competition here will sell his goods at the lower price, but as set forth by Mr. Palmer in his report, immediately after destroying competition here the foreigner put the price higher than ever before and exacted the difference in price from our people, because our people had no other market in the world to go to but that foreign market. Take the case of oxalic acid, which sold at 6½ cents a pound when our producers at home were compelled to go out of business because of that unfair competition. When that was accomplished the Germans immediately put the price up to 9 cents a pound—higher than ever before.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It seems to me that the gentleman has not yet answered the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. If I have not made myself clear, I want to say this, that if after destroying American competition the foreigner sells his goods in this country at the price at which he sells them at home, which would yield him a fair profit, then it would have a tendency to increase the price to the consumer if we destroyed that foreign competition, but generally that is not the result; that is not what happens.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The question that I was about to ask was in a case where there was no domestic competition.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then this bill does not apply.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Just one moment. Section 9 provides, in effect, if I understand it rightly, that goods admitted, either dutiable or free, shall have the amount of tax imposed upon them that represents the amount they are sold for here less than what they are sold for at home. Take coffee, for instance.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer the gentleman right there, because I think I see his point, and I want to answer it thoroughly and correctly if I can. The bill provides for goods dutiable and free, but that should apply only, and would apply only, to such goods as come in competition with articles made here, a competitive product, and would not apply to a noncompetitive product.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman refer me to the part of the bill which makes it apply to goods produced in this country only?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is such language in the bill, although I can not put my finger upon it now. The provisions of the bill apply only to an article that comes in competition, the kind or like of which is made in this country. If the kind or like is not made here, then the bill does not apply.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. When it came to the question of determining whether the goods were in competition, you might be able to utilize products filling the same use and say that they are competitive.

Mr. FORDNEY. If it were an article that came in competition or a like article, then it would apply, because a foreigner could destroy that competition here.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will not the result of that liberal interpretation of competition be that all articles will practically be subject to this same section 9?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I would not say so; and neither did any of the experts who were here and who spent eight days with me in preparing this bill. There were three gentlemen from the customs office in New York, who were very clear and very thorough in their knowledge—Mr. Davis, who had been in the employ of the Government for 29 years; Mr. Fix, for 30 years; and Mr. Wolfe, for some twenty-odd years, as I remember.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; although I am consuming too much time.

Mr. REAVIS. The first section of this bill provides:

That the "special duties" provided for in this act shall be levied upon all articles imported into the United States of a class or kind identical or comparable with a class or kind made or produced in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. That now constitutes a restriction of that kind?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Where is that?

Mr. REAVIS. On the first page of the bill, section 1.

Mr. FORDNEY. Under the five-minute rule I will answer any questions any gentleman may ask, if I can. [Applause.] In the course of my remarks I have made several references to the instances of unfair practices and dumping set forth in the annual report of Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer as Alien Property Custodian, and I will append some quotations from the report in question.

On pages 30 and 31 of this report Mr. Palmer makes the following statement with reference to the dumping of dyestuffs in the United States:

Overproduction led to determined effort to establish and maintain a large export trade. The natural advantages of the German industry, as compared to the industry in other countries, prevented serious competition in Germany itself. The Government's tariff and other policies enabled home prices to be kept up. It was then evidently to the advantage of any manufacturer to produce more than he could sell in the home market, even if his export trade had to be carried at a loss, when by doing so he could use a process so economical that its profits on home trade would be largely increased. Accordingly German dyestuffs began to appear in every country at prices which domestic manufacturers could not meet. The inevitable result was that in country after country the domestic manufacture was destroyed or stifled in its cradle. As soon as this had been accomplished it was no longer necessary for the German exporter to sell below cost. Prices were immediately raised and handsome profits realized. * * *

The methods under which this dumping policy was conducted, and its extent, may be illustrated by a few specific instances. Most of these occurred in branches of the chemical industry other than the manufacture of dyes, for the simple and sufficient reason that in this country, at least, the dyestuff industry never reached the point where it required much discouragement.

The report then proceeds to point out that in 1910 a group of men in the United States engaged in the manufacture of aniline oil, then selling at 11½ cents, and the Germans immediately began underselling this product, one of whose customers refused "an advantageous contract at 8½ cents, stating that he had assurance from the Germans that whatever price the Benzol Products Co. made would be met and bettered by them." This company struggled along without profits until the war gave it an opportunity to establish its business on a firm foundation.

In his report Mr. Palmer continues:

In 1903 there were in the United States five manufacturers of salicylic acid. By 1913 three of these had failed. * * * During the latter part of the decade referred to salicylic acid was selling in Germany at from 26½ to 30½ cents. During the same period the German houses were selling it in this country, after paying a duty of 5 cents, at 25 cents, or from 6 to 10 cents below what they were getting at home.

Of oxalic acid the report says:

In 1901 where there was no American manufacture it was sold by the Germans at 6 cents. In 1903, when the works of the American Acid & Alkali Co. was started, the price was immediately dropped to 4.7 cents, at about which figure it remained until 1907 when the American factory was shut down for a number of months. During this shut-down the price was instantly raised to 9 cents. When the factory reopened the price was again dropped until in 1908, when the company failed. * * *

The same process was carried on in regard to bicarbonate of potash. In 1900 there was no manufacture, and imports ran about 160,000 pounds. In 1901 American manufacture began. This succeeded so well that in 1906 imports had dropped to 45,000 pounds. At this time the American manufacturer's price was 6½ cents, while the import value was given at 4.9 cents. In the following year the Germans made a determined and successful onslaught. Their import value was lowered to 2.2 cents with the result that, instead of 45,000, 310,000 were imported. Accordingly in 1908 the American manufacturer failed. The price was immediately raised to 7½ cents and remained thereabout until the war.

Does the gentleman from North Carolina wish to use some time?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Where is the gentleman from Idaho? I thought that he was to come in for 40 minutes. Let these other gentlemen——

Mr. FORDNEY. If agreeable, I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, apart from its somewhat technical administrative details this bill is extremely simple. It provides that whenever goods are exported into the United States and sold here for less than their home value, or when that is not ascertainable the price for which they are sold in other countries, or if that can not be ascertained, then their cost of production, a duty shall be imposed upon them, in addition to all other duties, equal to the difference between the sales price here and the foreign home value, the value to countries other than the United States, or the cost of production, as the case may be. In other words, it is designed to prevent the capture of the American market by countries who are willing to sell their goods here cheaper than they sell them anywhere else.

This is good legislation. It is in line with that recently enacted and in process of enactment by many other countries to prevent the destruction of the home market for the home producer. It would be wise legislation under any conditions, but particularly so in anticipation of the return of peace conditions and the resumption of international competition. More than that, its passage becomes absolutely imperative, to my mind, in the face of the tariff policy announced by the President in his recent message to Congress, for without it there will be for the next year and a half no barrier to the inroads of the products of the world except that afforded by the entirely inadequate duties provided in the Underwood law. In that message the President went further than he has ever gone before in the direction of pure and absolute free trade. He virtually announces that he will veto any measure which has for its design the encouragement, by the use of the tariff or other measure for the restriction of imports, of any American industry except only the dyestuff industry. The position that the President now takes upon the tariff question is a complete reversal of that taken as late as the middle of the summer of 1916. On the 28th of July of that year he wrote a letter to the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, of Chicago, outlining his then position about the tariff, a sentence from which, a few days afterwards, I quoted in the House. Referring to the work expected to be done by the Tariff Commission, he said:

It ought to be possible by such means to make the question of duties merely a question of progress and development, a question of adopting means to ends, of facilitating and helping business, and employing to the utmost the resources of the country in a vast development of our business and enterprise.

I will concede that that sentence may be susceptible of different constructions, as sentences used by the President sometimes are, but there is no question as to how it struck the country or this House at that time. Before I had announced its authorship, Mr. Sloan, a then distinguished Representative from Nebraska, undertook to guess that its authorship lay either with Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan, or Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When later I stated that it came from no less a person than the President of the United States my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] became very indignant. After questioning my authority, which I stated to be the Washington Post, from which I read the extract—and, by the way, I confirmed its authenticity through a telegram from the president of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association a few days later—Mr. KITCHIN said:

Mr. Speaker, I want to deny in the name of the President and the name of Democrats of this House and of former Congresses and in the name of Democrats throughout the country that the President ever uttered such language, because, in my judgment, it is impossible for any man who voted for the Underwood Act or indorsed the Underwood Act, much less one who signed it, to have conceived and expressed publicly such high protective tariff sentiments. I have never known even as high a protectionist as Mr. FORDNEY or Mr. MOORE, to whom the gentleman from Nebraska referred, to utter such a sentiment with regard to the tariff. The man who believes that import duties should be merely a question of progress and development of business is bound to favor the repeal of the Underwood Act, for not a section or paragraph or line in that act was conceived or written upon any such theory. Of course he never made such a statement as the gentleman from Ohio or the Washington Post attributes to him. I repeat my denial in the name of the President and the Democratic Party.

Little more than three years later, in the message delivered on the 2d day of this month to the Congress, the President takes precisely opposite ground. He opposes any use whatever of the tariff to build up the business of the country by hampering in any way shipments of goods here by foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to print in my remarks all that part of the President's message which deals with the tariff question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman, does the gentleman from Ohio contend that the intervening world-wide war in which this country took part might not have changed conditions?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. So as to have warranted a change in the position even on the part of the President of the United States?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The object of my remarks to-day is to show that no such conditions have arisen, even as a result of the war, as to warrant such a remarkable change of policy.

Mr. BLANTON. Much has transpired during the past few years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I concede that and I shall elaborate upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At the outset of his discussion of the tariff question he says in his message:

The prejudice and passions engendered by decades of controversy between two schools of political and economic thought, the one believers in protection of American industries, the other believers in tariff for revenue only, must be subordinated to the single consideration of the public interest in the light of utterly changed conditions.

In other words, there is to be no longer any issue between the two parties upon the tariff. Our century-old policies are to be merged into the one vague policy of "the single consideration of the public interest," whatever that may mean. For myself I am prepared to concede that from the point of view of revenue the tariff question is not of the prime importance that it was before the war. The additional amount that could be raised from a tariff, if we Republicans could write it, as compared with the vast amount of revenue that must be raised for many years to come to pay for the expenditures, legitimate and illegitimate, contracted under this administration, would be relatively insignificant. That much I concede, but that there will be any abandonment by the Republican Party of the policy of protection I vigorously deny. [Applause.] You of the Democratic Party may throw your tariff-for-revenue planks into the waste-basket if you please, but I predict without hesitancy that in our next convention we Republicans will have in our platform a strong American protective plank, and upon that platform we shall sweep the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The President goes on in his message to elaborate upon the great increase in our balance of trade, due to our enormously increased exports, our loans of nearly $10,000,000,000 to the Allies, and the fact that we have now built our own ships. These balances, he says, can only be paid for in three ways—by extension of credits, importations of gold, or importations of goods. With one sweep of his pen he eliminates the first two of these from consideration.

Anything, therefore—

He says—

which would tend to prevent foreign countries from settling for our exports by shipments of goods into this country could only have the effect of preventing them from paying for our exports and therefore of preventing the exports from being made. The productivity of the country, greatly stimulated by the war, must find an outlet by exports to foreign countries, and any measures taken to prevent imports will inevitably curtail exports. * * *

Later on he says:

Whatever, therefore, may have been our views during the period of the growth of American business concerning tariff legislation we must now adjust our own economic life to a changed condition growing out of the fact that American business is full grown and that America is the greatest capitalist in the world.

This means, if I can read the English language, but one thing, and that is that we must for the future abandon any effort through the tariff to conserve in any degree our home market for our own producers and seek only the development and extension of our export trade.

In the very next sentence he goes on and says:

The provincial standards and policies of the past which have held American business as in a strait-jacket must yield and give way to the needs and exigencies of the new day in which we live.

I confess I find it difficult to adjust my mind to the proposition that in the future, as American business is now "full grown" and we have become "the greatest capitalist in the world," that, therefore, we must at once cast off that "strait-jacket" of "provincialism" which has made us what we are. If the maintenance of our policy, established from the time of our beginning as a Nation, of noninterference in disputes between other nations in which we have no interest or concern is "provincialism"; if insistence upon the Monroe doctrine and of our right to determine for ourselves who shall and who shall not be admitted to our country and our citizenship is "provincialism"; if concern for the retention of the American market for the products of American industry and American labor is "provincialism," then I for one am willing to stay provincial for a while longer.

Of course conditions have changed, but that they have changed to the extent that we must abandon all the standards and policies of the past, so that, forgetting our home market, we are to enter into a mad scramble for the world market, I for one refuse to believe. I am willing to go to any reasonable extent to make the path of our allies toward industrial rehabilitation as easy as possible, but I balk at giving them free rein in the American market. I may be provincial, but I have not yet abandoned the belief that the American market is primarily for the American producer. Furthermore, I believe I am gifted with sufficient vision to see that the abandonment of any measures restricting importations into this country nominally in the interest of those of our allies who are our largest debtors would in the end redound not so much to their benefit as to the benefit of other countries who owe us nothing. Does it need argument to show that duties low enough to invite large importations from Great Britain and France would invite even larger importations from Japan? If it be good policy to turn over a portion of the American market to those of the nations who owe us money that they may thus more early cancel their debt to us why not do it through the medium of reciprocal trade agreements, which the President has the power to negotiate under existing law? Under such a policy, while sacrificing much, we would at least have received something in return. Under the policy announced by the President we sacrifice far more, and not only do we receive nothing in return, but those countries which deserve most at our hands will be the last to benefit.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean by reciprocal relations—perhaps I should not hazard a guess at what the gentleman means by trade relations——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Trade agreements, I said.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean that America should negotiate special trade agreements with certain nations giving them preferences over other nations, thereby abandoning the doctrine of equal treatment of other nations?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, it has been the policy of this country for many years, both under Democratic and Republican administrations, to have reciprocal trade agreements with other nations that put their imports on a different footing from those of other nations.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The point I wanted to get at was whether the gentleman was advocating the idea of negotiating a great number of special trade agreements with the nations that owe us money so as to accept their imports while excluding those of countries such as Japan?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The President bases his main contention against the establishment of any protective tariff on the proposition that some of our allies owe us large sums of money, and the only way they can pay it is by the shipment of goods into this country. I have no particular plan, and I am not in a position to give advice to this administration. I merely say that under the Underwood law the President has the power to negotiate trade agreements with such nations as he pleases, and if the prime object now is to afford nations which owe us money the means to pay that money, why not make separate arrangements with those nations and not throw the entire American market open to the products of the world.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I really wanted to get the gentleman's view, which is, as I understand him, that we should negotiate separate treaty and trade agreements with England, France, Italy, and other countries——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not say we should; I simply say that the President has the power——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I thought the gentleman suggested that as an alternative. The gentleman remembers the great fight on the Canadian treaty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I remember its final fate rested with Canada and not with this country.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman also remembers the campaign afterwards, in which it was a very great issue?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I recall the fact that so far as the House and Senate was concerned, it passed in this country. It was beaten in Canada. I do not know what the result any treaty the President might negotiate with France would be in France.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman knows that in the succeeding campaign, after Congress approved the Canadian treaty, that became a great issue, in which the portion of the Republican Party led by Mr. Taft was attacked by that portion of it which was led by Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would not want to suggest anything that would bring the Democratic Party into any greater disrepute than it is in now.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think I realize the gentleman's solicitude, and this bill may aid the Democratic Party.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield, although my time is almost up.

Mr. WINGO. I am not a free-trader myself——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know the gentleman is not.

Mr. WINGO. Just following the gentleman's idea of the goods we could take from France, France has not the gold to meet the balance of trade against her, and has not had for some time. What goods can we take from France?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do know that the President says that we must not use the tariff in any way to hinder importations from France, because that is the only way that France can pay her debts to us. I do not know what those goods may be. They may be textiles; they may be silks; they may be laces. They will not be wines. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. There is no doubt about that. Here is the point I wanted to get at. The gentleman, of course, recognizes that there is a happy mean between two extremes. There is a practical middle ground between the absolute free-trader and the man who wants a prohibitive tariff, that will shut out everything. Now, can the gentleman suggest as a practical proposition—and I have an idea that is what the President had in mind—that our tariff laws should not be used as an absolute power to prohibit these nations from sending us the only thing they can pay us in; that is, commodities? Can the gentleman offer any plan that would meet that situation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I refer particularly to what the President says, without qualification, which is this:

> Anything, therefore, which would tend to prevent foreign countries from settling for our exports by shipments of goods into this country could only have the effect of preventing them from paying for our exports and therefore prevent the exports from being made.

Now, this is what I am particularly calling to the attention of Members of Congress: Assuming it to be wise to deal ultrafairly, so far as tariff duties are concerned, with those nations which owe us money, offering them thereby the means for settling their debts, if we establish such duties as will encourage high-cost countries like Great Britain and France to send their goods in here, how much more will it encourage Japan and the cheap-cost countries to flood our market? And will not those nations—Japan and the other cheap-cost nations—benefit very much more than would Great Britain or France or any of our other allies to whom we have loaned money? How can there be any question of that? I merely suggest this as to the question of reciprocal trade agreements, that whether or not it be a wise policy, at least it would be a better policy than that of throwing our market open to the world.

Mr. WINGO. Allow me to see if I catch what the gentleman means. Of course, we recognize that there is a lower cost, say, in Japan than in England or France.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman suggests that a better way, instead of having a tariff that would be low enough to permit England and France to meet the balances on commodities, which would at the same time permit Japan to flood us, we better have a separate reciprocal agreement with those countries that we want to sell to?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that would be better.

Mr. WINGO. Has this occurred to the gentleman? It seems to be pretty well understood by those who have studied the economic conditions of America, as well as of England, France, and Belgium, that the war added greatly to the productive capacity of American manufacture. Machinery and plants were put in operation primarily during the war for war purposes, yet were so constructed that with little changes they can be turned into industrial activities after the war. If that be true, it seems to be agreed by most of the authorities I have consulted that we will produce in eight months' time as much as the American market can consume, and must have some other market for the four months of products. The other nations being upon a paper basis, how are they going to settle their balance in return for this four months' surplus that we must find a market for in order to maintain the prosperity of the American manufacturer?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, the gentleman is assuming several things that I do not think ought to be assumed. He is assuming, in the first place, that all the equipment installed for the production of purely war material will be equally useful in producing peace material.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I did not say "all." I say "some."

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is also assuming that conditions as to wages and the conditions of production are as favorable as they were before the war. I do not think that either of those assumptions can safely be made. I do not believe that the store of goods in this country under conditions as they exist to-day will be so much greater than the American demand that we will have to ship them abroad.

But that is not the point that I am endeavoring to bring out. I am going to repeat again: The President says that we must now seek export trade, because we can not afford to prevent the nations who owe us money from having a free rein in the American market. He says that there are only three ways to pay the debt that is owing to us: First, with gold; second, with extension of credit; and, third, with importation of goods. He says it is indefensible to further extend credit, that we would view with alarm the sending in by other nations of gold, and it is upon that theory perhaps that the Treasury Department is not receiving now, under this administration, any of the interest on our foreign obligations. They do not want it apparently. It is their policy not to accept shipments of gold from Europe. That leaves one alternative, that Europe must pay the amount owed to us by importing their goods into this country and thereby displacing to that extent goods manufactured in this country. My proposition is that even if that were good policy it would redound far more to the benefit of nations like Japan, who owe us nothing, than it would to Great Britain and France, who owe us largely.

Mr. WINGO. It is not the policy of the present administration not to take all the gold it can get from Europe, and as a matter of fact recently we have insisted upon arrangements which would give us the right to ship to this country, upon demand, certain sums of gold that we are having placed where we can control it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That may be the gentleman's view, but it is not the President's.

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is the view of the Treasury, and the President is in harmony with that view, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Whatever may be the view of the gentleman from Arkansas and the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, that is not the President's view as announced the other day to this Congress. He said specifically "Europe is in no position at the present time to ship gold to us, nor could we contemplate further imports of gold into this country without concern."

Mr. WINGO. That does not seem to say that the President does not want it. He is recognizing the fact—and it is a fact, as the gentleman will find if he will investigate—that they have not the gold and can not procure it. On the contrary, we are getting all the gold from there that we can lay hands on.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I assume that it is proper to be indulgent to the Allies in view of their industrial conditions, but I am not willing to sacrifice the American market to accomplish that result. [Applause.]

I confess that I listened to the reading of this portion of the President's message with feelings of the keenest disappointment. I had sincerely hoped that there might have been cooperation between Congress and the Executive in the passage of some tariff measures designed to save at least those industries which are of peculiarly war origin, and whose destruction upon resumption of international competition without legislative assistance I fear is inevitable. The only exception the President makes is in the case of dyestuffs, and for that I am deeply grateful, for it insures the final enactment of some such measure as we passed here in the House not long ago; but so far as any other tariff measures are concerned we might as well face the inevitable. They are as dead as door nails.

Under these circumstances the passage of this bill becomes peculiarly imperative. It will not prevent the invasion of the American market by goods which can be made abroad cheaper than we can make them, but at least it will keep out goods to be sold here cheaper than our competitors can make them.

For these reasons, gentlemen, I earnestly advocate the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman said the bills to which he referred were "dead." I understand he means because we can not ever expect to receive the approval of the President?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; because the President in effect announces in his message that he will veto every one of them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to my colleague [Mr. GOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, what I shall say while dealing with revenue and expenditures only in a remote degree, if at all, bears on this bill.

At the end of each session of Congress it has been customary to review the work of that Congress so far as appropriations are concerned. The burden of debt left by the war and the demand for increased appropriations occasioned thereby make it necessary that we fully understand at the beginning of this session of Congress what the estimated financial requirements of the Government are.

The Book of Estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury a few days ago carries a total estimate for the regular annual appropriation bills and the permanent and indefinite appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, of $4,865,410,031.62. This sum does not include certain charges for the next fiscal year for which appropriations have been made and which have not been taken into account in arriving at this total.

The Post Office appropriation act approved February 28, 1919, carried an appropriation of $78,000,000 to be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and which is in addition to the $26,000,000 included in the total of permanent appropriations for road construction for the next fiscal year. This item is not included in the estimate referred to.

Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to redeem war-savings certificates, and by his annual report, just submitted, he proposes to pay out during the next fiscal year $125,000,000 for such purposes. This amount is not included in the Book of Estimates.

So, too, under the law the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to retire Federal reserve bank notes and the notes of national banks, and by his annual report he expects to retire notes of this character during the next fiscal year aggregating $25,000,000, but no estimate is made for the money necessary to redeem such notes.

In addition, he proposes, as shown by his annual report, to expend $300,000 during the next fiscal year in the miscellaneous redemption of the public debt.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that $740,000,000 will be used for the present fiscal year in the exercise of the authority granted him by the act of April 4, 1918, for the period of the war and for one year thereafter to set aside a fund not to exceed 5 per cent of the amount of the bonds outstanding, to be used for retirement of such bonds. No estimate is made for such purpose for the next fiscal year because of the sinking-fund provision provided for in the act of March 3, 1919. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the sinking fund provided for in said act will require an expenditure of $287,500,000, and said sum is carried in the Book of Estimates. The necessity for the payment of the $300,000 above referred to is in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury but is not carried in the Book of Estimates.

These items that are not included in the Book of Estimates, aggregating $228,300,000, may be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury irrespective of any action by Congress.

Naturally, no estimate is to be found in the Book of Estimates for increased compensation to Government employees. The amount estimated to be expended during the current fiscal year because of the $240 bonus provision contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial act is $30,760,000. The Postmaster General states that if the increase to postal employees granted for the present fiscal year be reenacted for the next fiscal year it will require an appropriation of $40,000,000 in excess of the estimated expenditures of that department. Formerly the departments estimated for increases in compensation for certain Government employees in the District of Columbia. Because of the provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial act of March 1, 1919, providing for a Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries the executive departments have decided that no increases in compensation of Federal employees should be estimated for, leaving the entire matter open for the action of Congress. Conditions regarding the cost of living have not changed to any appreciable degree during the past year, and in all likelihood Congress will be compelled to grant increases in compensation to the Federal employees equal to the increases granted for the present fiscal year, which will mean an increase in the estimates of $40,000,000 for postal employees and $30,760,000 for employees in the other branches of the Government service.

As to expenditures for the United States Railroad Administration, in his annual report the Secretary of the Treasury says:

> No estimate of expenditures by the United States Railroad Administration for the fiscal year 1921 is included, because on the date of this report the Railroad Administration was unable to make an estimate for that fiscal year, inasmuch as the sums that will be required are almost entirely dependent upon congressional action in connection with the return of the railroads to private control.

In the absence of congressional action guaranteeing a return to the railroads after they have been restored to their owners there still remains enormous obligations of the Government to pay the deficit brought about by the operation of the railroads by the United States Railroad Administration. The amount required depends also on the settlements which the Railroad Administration may be able to make in the disposition of railroad equipment purchased by the Government during the war and in the collection of advances already made to railroad companies. The deficit in Government operation of the railroads, which is large, must be paid out of the Treasury. Unquestionably the expenditure during the next fiscal year for this purpose will be very large, but the sum that will be required for this purpose for the next fiscal year is so problematical and depends upon so many contingencies that it is not safe at this time to venture a conservative estimate.

Very naturally, too, the amount of supplemental and deficiency estimates are altogether problematical, and depend upon a great many contingencies. There is no accurate way of arriving at an estimate of the amount which may be requested for the next fiscal year. The highest amount in the aggregate requested in supplemental estimates in any year immediately prior to 1916 was $31,500,000, while the average per year for a period of 10 years prior to the war was $17,867,500. The largest amount of deficiency estimates sent to Congress for any one year immediately prior to the war was $57,000,000, while the average per year for a 10-year prewar period was $24,270,000. Is it not fair to assume that the supplemental and deficiency estimates for the next fiscal year as compared with the prewar estimates for like purposes will be twice as large as they were for the 10-year prewar average? Using this as a basis, I believe we may assume that for the next fiscal year the supplemental estimates will exceed $35,000,000 and the deficiency estimates will not be less than $50,000,000. To show that this estimate is conservative it is only necessary to remind the House that in the first week of this session of Congress one supplemental estimate was received for $10,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know that I fully understand the gentleman. The matters that the gentleman has mentioned have included proposals that amount to $50,000,000, and the amount that possibly would be allowed on those omitted items, such as increased pay for the Army and Navy and the Shipping Board items, and so on, will aggregate, as they will be submitted finally to the country, somewhere to nearly half a billion dollars.

Mr. GOOD. I am not taking into consideration any of those things. I am only taking into consideration the payment of those things that are provided for by law, where appropriations have been made or where authority has been given to pay out the money. Before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce Mr. Sherley estimated that there would be required to be paid by the Government not less than $371,000,000 and possibly $471,000,000 in order to have the Government settle accounts with the railroad companies; but how much of that will be required to be paid during this fiscal year and how much will hang over into the next fiscal year no one can tell. It is so problematical that I have not attempted to deal with it, because I am only dealing with the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, which will have to be dealt with, and in that regard I have limited my consideration to those items where we can, with some degree of accuracy, make an estimate.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman express a fear that the deficit will go beyond what the Secretary of the Treasury stated?

Mr. GOOD. I have no doubt that it will go beyond that unless the revenue receipts exceed the estimates.

Mr. FESS. Then does the gentleman know how we can act favorably upon the recommendation of the President that we reduce the income tax and the war excess-profits tax?

Mr. GOOD. I do not believe it will be safe to reduce any taxes at the present time unless some provision is made to supply the money from some other source that that reduction would take out of the Treasury of the United States.

I realize that some of these estimated requirements are only estimates, but if any error has been made in making them, it will be found, I am sure, on the part of conservatism.

Let us recapitulate them in order to see what our estimated requirements really are for the next fiscal year:

Recapitulation for 1921.

Total of estimates submitted in the Book of Estimates for 1921	$4,865,410,031.62
Construction of roads (carried in post-office act of February, 1919)	78,000,000.00
Redemption of war-savings certificates	125,000,000.00
Retirement of Federal reserve and national bank notes	25,000,000.00
Miscellaneous debt redemptions	300,000.00
$240 bonus, if repeated for 1921	30,760,000.00
Postal increase, if repeated for 1921	40,000,000.00
Supplemental estimates which may be transmitted during the session on account of 1921	35,000,000.00
Deficiency estimates which may be submitted against the revenues of 1921	50,000,000.00
Grand total	5,249,470,031.62

In order that we may see the entire picture as to our financial transactions it is interesting to know the sources from which the revenue must come with which to pay these extraordinary expenses. These estimated revenues are fully set forth in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and are as follows:

Customs	$325,000,000
Internal revenue:
Income and excess profits	3,000,000,000
Miscellaneous internal revenue	1,190,000,000
Public-land sales	1,000,000
Miscellaneous sources (including estimated return of $500,000,000 of capital stock of Grain Corporation)	896,000,000
Panama Canal, tolls, etc	8,000,000
War-savings certificates	175,000,000
Deposits to retire Federal reserve and national-bank notes	25,000,000
Postal savings bonds	350,000
Postal revenues	415,500,000
Total estimated receipts	6,035,850,000

It will be observed that there is an excess of estimated revenue over estimated expenditures. But this surplus immediately disappears when considered in connection with the estimated deficit in the general fund of the Treasury on June 30, 1920. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that on the 30th of June, 1920, there will be a deficit in the general fund of the Treasury of $3,155,888,543. If we deduct this surplus from the estimated deficit we have a total estimated deficit of $2,369,508,574.62. If to this amount we add the item for a working balance, which it has been found necessary to keep in the Treasury, of $500,000,000, we have a total estimated deficit on June 30, 1921, of $2,869,508,574.62.

I shall append to my remarks a detailed comparative statement with regard to the estimates for appropriations, and a comparative statement showing the estimated revenue and the sources from which it is derived, for the fiscal years 1920 and 1921.

It is not my purpose to comment upon these estimates. I present them for the study and consideration of the House. They should be studied and considered along with our consideration of such measures as the Fuller pension bill, the civil-service retirement bill, the bills providing for increases in pay to officers and men in the Army and Navy, the Mondell land bill, the Morgan housing bill, and numerous bills for the payment of bonuses to our discharged soldiers. Meritorious as some of these measures may be, every one of them should be considered only with respect to the condition of the Treasury of the United States and the demands that will be made upon it in the discharge of obligations already created by law. Whatever its legislative duties, no greater problem confronts this Congress than that of applying the pruning knife to the estimates of expenditures. It must be applied with intelligence, but with vigor and determination, for if this Congress shall appropriate more than $1,000,000,000 for the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year over and above the necessary appropriations for the United States Railroad Administration it will fall short of its obligations to the taxpayers of the United States. After all, it is idle to reduce estimates if such reduction shall only result in the enactment of legislation whereby the Government is required to assume new duties that are no more meritorious than those curtailed or eliminated, and which may require even larger appropriations.

Table comparing by bills estimates of regular annual appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 with the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1920, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

The column of 1920 appropriations does not include the sums carried for that fiscal year in deficiency and miscellaneous appropriation acts for similar purposes.
The estimated appropriations for 1921 will be found in detail in the annual Book of Estimates, House Document No. 411, transmitted to Congress on December 1, 1919.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I ask how the time stands on the respective sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has eight minutes remaining, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has used no time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] seven minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized for 27 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SMITH of Michigan having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2377. An act to amend section 1 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, so as to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board and employees by the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks; and

S. 806. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Iowa Tribe of Indians against the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 1199) to prohibit the purchase, sale, or possession for the purpose of sale, of certain wild birds in the District of Columbia, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

ANTIDUMPING LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I think it is a reflection, and that it shows a want of respect for the great Ways and Means Committee to discuss this important tariff measure with only 31 Members on the floor, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Idaho is not going to discuss the tariff bill.

Mr. BLANTON. He is going to discuss the question of the Russian soviet, and he ought to have an audience to hear him on that momentous question.

Mr. FRENCH. I request the gentleman not to make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. As the Republican whip is getting them in out of the cloakroom, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, some little time ago, purely as a matter for my own information, I made something of an analysis of the Russian soviet constitution. In talking the question over with various Members of the House, several of them were good enough to express the wish that at some time I would address the House on the subject, and it is with this in view that I have asked for a little time to-day.

It has been nearly three years since March 12, 1917, when the unrest in Russia culminated in the overthrow of the dynasty of the Romanoffs, and then with kaleidoscopic rapidity the Government was transferred from Czar Nicholas to Prince George Lvoff, from Lvoff to Kerensky, and from Kerensky to Lenin and Trotski, the leaders of the soviet form of government.

We are not surprised when extreme and radical groups of people applaud an extreme and radical type of government. We are not surprised that anarchists everywhere, that I. W. W.s everywhere, that the left wing of the Socialist Party of the United States, that the Social Democratic Party in the United States, and similar organizations in other countries heralded with delight the soviet government in Russia; but we are surprised when people who, we assume, have accurate habits of thought express their opinion as favorable to the soviet system.

Not very long ago a professor in one of the leading universities of our country spoke his mind in favor of soviet government. As soon as he understood a little more of what it meant he was just as ready to withdraw his approval.

Not many weeks ago the Postal Employees' Union of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., adopted a resolution pertaining to Russia that included the following:

> And whereas fully 95 per cent of the population of Russia fully supports the soviet government of Russia, be it resolved that the Minnesota Federation of Labor express its sympathy with the soviet Russia.

I understand that this resolution was strenuously advocated by four members of the Postal Employees' Union; that these four members, who were delegates from the union to the State convention of the American Federation of Labor of Minnesota that convened on July 22–23, 1919, presented the resolution to that organization and secured its adoption.

Now, I can not for one minute fail to think that the members of the State Federation of Labor of Minnesota were imposed upon and misled. It may be, too, that they did not intend to indorse the idea. In my judgment, one or two features of the soviet system may have been presented to the convention and a strong plea was then made in which the sorrows and horrors through which Russia has gone during recent years—yes, indeed, during centuries—were presented to the convention and with the idea that the convention was approving some action that the Russian people have taken looking to democracy, a favorable vote was had upon the resolution.

SOVIET OPPOSED BY AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

But the attitude of the Minneapolis Postal Employees' Union and the Minnesota State Federation of Labor must not be taken as the attitude of the laboring men of the country or the American Federation of Labor.

The convention of the American Federation of Labor, that was held in Atlantic City in June of this year, very clearly indicated its opposition to Bolshevism and to the soviet government.

Quoting Mr. Walling, in the August number of the American Federationist:

> Bolshevism in America was buried on the 17th of June. And Bolshevism in Russia will receive no support from American labor until the soviets have repudiated sovietism and surrendered unconditionally to their deadly enemy, democracy. The convention of the American Federation of Labor, by a crushing majority, definitely refused its indorsement of the soviet government of Russia, "or any other form of government in that country, until the peoples of Russia, through a constituent or other form of national assembly, representing all of the people, through popular elections, shall have established a truly democratic form of government."

What is the soviet system of government, and do we want it?

A government has no right to exist save only as it serves the highest interests of the people who make up the government and who come into contact with it.

Now, if the soviet system is better than ours, by all means let us adopt it; let us lay aside the experiment in government that we have tried for over 100 years and take over the soviet system that promises so much.

It is, then, from the standpoint of a comparison of the essential principles of the soviet system with the essential principles of the representative system such as we know it in America that I want to consider the question.

In January, 1918, the group of Russian people headed by Lenin and Trotski adopted what might be called a declaration of rights, and on July 10, 1918, the All-Russian Congress of Soviets formally adopted a constitution, and this instrument recites that the bill of rights is part of the organic law. These documents are the basic foundation of the soviet government. The form of government is known as soviet, and the active leaders in its support are Bolshevists.

Strangely enough, a good many writers seem to assume that the only unique feature of the soviet government is group representation.

For instance, Mr. Oswald G. Villard, in a paper in the official organ of the Academy of Political and Social Science, the Annals, for July, 1919, on the "Need of social reorganization in America," said:

> There is something attractive in group representation, which is what the soviet is.

Again he says:

Yet the other day one of our own American officials at Paris solemnly assured the newspaper men that if the soviet type of government were made really representative, he saw no reason why it should not be as democratic as any government, if not more so. It was only to the men who were running the present unfair and undemocratic soviet government in Russia that our Government objected, he declared.

I desire to discuss group representation under the soviet government a little later on, and I think before I get through it will be quite clear that group representation is a mere feature of the soviet form of government. It is merely the sugar-coating to the pill.

The American officer referred to by Mr. Villard says if the soviet type of government were made "really representative, it would be as democratic as any government, if not more so." You had as well say that if black were made white it would be white.

The fact of the business is there is absolutely no philosophy by which the soviet form of government can be made representative unless the fundamental principles on which it rests shall be transformed and changed as completely as the changes of elements would be in color to make black white. [Applause.]

Surely the objection that a thoughtful American must have to the soviet form of government for America does not turn on anything other than the structure of the soviet government. For the purposes of my discussion, it is not material whether it is administered by good men or bad, by statesmen or reckless adventurers. What I want to discuss is the structure itself.

THE STRUCTURE.

From an examination of the soviet constitution, it appears that the executive authority is combined with the legislative, and there is no mention of a judiciary. Also it will be seen that Russia for its government is divided into units of various sizes, just as is the United States. We have the country as a whole, States, counties, and other local units such as districts, precincts, or parishes, or urban units, such as cities, towns, and villages, depending upon the State. Then we have the different bodies chosen to govern in these units. So in Russia.

Russia, considered as a whole, is divided into regions, provinces, counties, and rural and village units.

Then we have the governing body for each unit. This governing body is known as a soviet.

There is no magic in the word "soviet." It merely means a council. It means a legislative or deliberative body. It had as well be called a council, a congress, or a parliament. In Russia there are several different soviets—the local rural, the rural, the village or urban, the county, the provincial, the regional, and the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. These may correspond to deliberative bodies of our precincts, our counties, our States, and our Nation.

Now, so far there is nothing incongruous. But how are the soviets elected?

SOVIETS—HOW ELECTED.

In the first place, instead of the people voting by parties or by groups representing public opinion, they vote at least theoretically by trades or crafts. This point I want to discuss later. But for whom do they vote? For members of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets? No. For members of the regional or provincial soviet? No. For members of the county soviet? No. For members of the local soviet? Yes. That is, the people voting by trades elect members of the particular craft to which they belong to the local soviet. Now, this is all the part the people themselves have in this much heralded government.

The people, then, or, I shall say, those of the people who have the franchise, in theory have the right to vote for the members of the local soviet. The local soviet in the cities is called the urban soviet; in the country it is called the rural local soviet.

Now, this represents the final responsibility that is placed upon the people. There probably never was devised a clearer way to show the contrast between two objects being compared than to do as Hamlet did when he said, "Look here, upon this picture and on this." Having that in mind I am going to try to examine the Russian Government by placing it alongside the Government of your own country. Let me then direct your attention to the different units of government as they exist in Russia and the corresponding units of government as they exist in the United States.

COMPARISON OF LEGISLATIVE BODIES.

I want you to consider first the legislative bodies that exist in Russia and the subdivisions of government under Russia and the legislative bodies that exist in the United States from our Federal Government through the States on down to the officers elected in our precincts, villages, and towns.

LEGISLATIVE BODIES OF RUSSIA (UNDER SOVIET SYSTEM) AND THE UNITED STATES—HOW CHOSEN.

The deadly parallel.

RUSSIA.	UNITED STATES.
1. All-Russian Congress of Soviets. Members are chosen by members of— 1. Urban soviets. 2. Provincial soviets (but provincial soviet is not elected by the people).	Senate and House of Representatives. Elected by direct vote of people.
2. Regional soviet. Members are chosen by— 1. Urban soviets. 2. County soviets (but the county soviet is not elected by the people).	No governmental subdivision to correspond (would be like a group of States, as New England States).
3. Provincial soviet. Members are chosen by members of— 1. Urban soviets. 2. Rural soviets (but the rural soviet is not elected by the people).	State legislatures. Elected by the direct vote of the people.
4. County soviet. Members are chosen by members of— 1. Urban soviets (in cities of not more than 10,000). 2. Rural soviets (but the rural soviets are not elected by the people).	County commissioners or similar officers. Elected by the direct vote of the people.
5. Rural soviet. Members are chosen by members of— 1. Village soviets (of less than 1,000 people). 2. Rural local soviets (the people allowed to vote for village and local soviet members).	No corresponding governmental subdivision. (It is less than a county and more than a township.)
6. Local soviet. 1. Rural local soviet. Elected by part of the people. 2. Urban soviet. Deputies elected by part of the people.	Precinct, township, or other local organization. Officers elected by the people. City, town, and village offices. Elected by the people.

The deadly parallel to which I have called your attention is most striking. Take first the highest legislative body in the United States—the Congress. It is made up of Senators and Representatives elected by the direct vote of the people. For over a hundred years we chose our Senators in indirect manner; that is, the Senators were elected by members of the legislature who themselves were elected by the people.

In Russia the highest legislative body is known as the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. Do the people vote for the members of that body? Not at all.

The farmer in Russia votes for his rural local soviet member, and when he casts that ballot his power as a voter has come to an end. The members of that local soviet vote to elect members to the rural soviet; the members of the rural soviet then vote to elect members to the provincial soviet; and the members of the provincial soviet vote to elect members to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

In other words, as the Senators of the United States in the olden times were once removed from the American voter, the members of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets are three times removed from the Russian farmer. The city voter is trusted more than the farmer, for he votes direct for his urban representative, who in turn votes for the member of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

Is it possible that this learned professor to whom I referred had this in mind when he expressed his approval of the soviet system? Is it possible that members of such organizations as those to which I have referred had this in mind when they commended the soviet system?

In Russia the political organization that is less than the entire nation is what is known as a region. It would correspond in the United States to a group of States such as the New England States or the Pacific Coast States. In the United States we have no political organization that presides over or is responsible to a group of our States. The State itself is the only unit above the county between the county and the Federal Government. However, under the Russian soviet system the members of the legislative body known as the regional soviet are chosen not by the people but by the urban and county soviets, the urban soviet members being elected in the cities by the direct vote of those of the Russian people who are permitted the ballot, while the county soviets are twice removed from the farmer, who again can not be trusted with the responsibility of voting for so much as a county officer in Russia.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. How do they elect the speaker or chairmen?

Mr. FRENCH. Each body has charge of and elects its own officers.

Mr. QUIN. How do they elect the president?

Mr. FRENCH. I will come to that a little later, if the gentleman will bear with me.

The next political unit in Russia is the Province. This unit corresponds with the State under our own system. In Russia the provincial soviet, a legislative body, is made up of members elected by whom? The people? Not at all. It is made up of members elected, first, by the urban soviets, who are elected by the people, and by the rural soviets, who are once removed from the people. In the United States our State legislatures are elected by whom? By the people.

In the translation of the constitution of Russia that I have, the word "county" is used as the English equivalent of the Russian word, and it corresponds with a small section of country similar to the county in our own Government. In the United States the persons who are intrusted with the supervision of county affairs are the county commissioners. These officers are elected by the people just as are our Senators and Members of the House and just as are members of the legislatures. In Russia we find that the members of the county soviet are not chosen by the people; they are chosen by the urban soviets and by the rural soviets.

We pass to the organizations that are less than the county soviet, and we find rural soviets made up of members who are elected not by the people but by two groups—first, the village voter from villages whose population is less than 1,000 people and by the rural local soviet.

In the cities of more than 10,000 people we find urban soviets. The members of the urban soviets, the members of the village soviets, and the members of the local rural soviets receive their franchise direct from the people. This is Russia. This is the soviet system.

The struggle for liberty, the struggle for the right to participate in government, is one that is close to the life thought of English-speaking people. It is close to the life thought of the American people. As we search the traditions that tell of the struggles for parliamentary government in Great Britain, we go back to the time when Magna Charta was snatched from the hands of King John. We go back to the time when Edward the First, I believe, called together the noblemen of Great Britain in repeated conclaves that could be considered a forerunner of the legislative bodies of to-day in Great Britain. And then we drafted our own Constitution, written by the lifeblood of the bravest of our land and amidst the suffering of all of our people. We drafted such a Constitution as would reserve to the people themselves the right to cast their votes for the Members of the most numerous branch of their national representative body and made only once removed from the people the Senate, and within the last six years that one barrier that has stood between the people and the Senate of the United States has been broken down, and to-day the American people vote not only for their precinct and village and city officers as do the Russian people, whose power is exhausted with such vote, but our people vote as well for their county officers, they vote for their State officers, and for the officers that represent them in the great legislative bodies of all the States and of the United States.

Gentlemen, there never was a system applied to any large country that was more free, more democratic than is the system applied in the United States, and there never was a system under which the people could hold their representatives to greater responsibility than in the United States. On the other hand, there never was a representative system in any government that is worthy of the name so tyrannical and so calculated to separate the people from their right to participate in government as the system that has been devised by the soviet rulers of Russia.

Gentlemen, there never was a corporation, trust, or monopoly so organized as to take from the stockholders of that organization the responsibility of sharing and having a part in the administration of affairs of the business as has been done in the constitution of the soviet government of Russia in taking away from the people of that great land the right to participate in the affairs of government, in the governing of all Russia, in the region, in the province, or in the county.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

Now let us pass on to the executive officers in Russia and the executive officers in the United States.

For your comparison I have again presented what I have called the deadly parallel.

The executive officers of all Russia are what are termed in the constitution the commissars.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The deadly parallel.

RUSSIA.	UNITED STATES.
1. The executive officers of all Russia are chosen by the all-Russian executive committee, which is chosen by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, which is chosen by provincial and urban soviets, etc. (In Russia the chief executive is three times removed from the city voter and five times removed from the rural voter.)	The President is elected by electors chosen by the direct vote of the people to vote for a particular person. (In the United States the President is once removed from the people.)
2. Regional and provincial executive officers are chosen by the respective soviets, which themselves are not chosen by the people.	Governors are elected by direct vote of the people.

The All-Russian Congress of Soviets is necessarily a very large body and it is an unwieldy body. For the purpose, then, of close executive administration the constitution provides that there shall be an executive committee appointed of 200 members. This executive committee is chosen by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. As the congress itself is once removed from the city dweller and three times removed from the country dweller the committee chosen by the congress is two times and four times, respectively, removed from these groups of Russian people.

This committee then selects another committee of 17 members, which is called the council of people's commissars, each member of which presides over another committee chosen by the council and which exercises the function of a cabinet department of the government. The chairman of each committee is the chief executive of the particular department to which the business of the committee pertains. The chairman of the foreign affairs committee and the chairman of the committees on the army and the navy become necessarily the most important members of the Russian Government, and the chairmanship of the foreign affairs committee is the office that is now filled by Lenin. The chairmanship of the committee on military affairs is the office filled by Trotski. It is by virtue of being chairman of this commissariat that Mr. Lenin has become what we popularly call the premier, the head of the Russian Government.

Mr. Lenin, then, is responsible not to the people, not to the country, not to the State or Province. He is responsible to the executive committee of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, which in turn is responsible to the congress. He is from three to five times removed from the voting power of the people of Russia.

Contrast this, if you please, with the Chief Executive of the United States. The President, it is true, is not elected by a direct vote of the people, but by electors, who are chosen with the specific duty of voting for a particular candidate for President. For more than a hundred years we have followed this system, and no man has ever failed to vote for the candidate for President for whom he was chosen to cast his ballot. It is practically the same as the people themselves voting direct for President. No choice is given to the elector. He becomes a sort of living ballot typifying the vote of the people. He expresses the voice, the wish, of the people. Is it possible that any thoughtful person can contrast this system with the system that obtains in Russia and find that the system in Russia is more democratic?

But how about organizations that are less extensive than all of Russia? As I said, we have no political organization that corresponds to the regional organization that exists in Russia, and I shall say in passing merely that the executive officers of the regional organization in Russia are appointed by the regional soviet in precisely the same way as the officers of all Russia are appointed by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. But the title "people's commissar" belongs only to an officer of all Russia and may not be used by an officer of a lesser unit.

We then pass to the provincial government, which corresponds to the government of States. In the United States the chief executive of every State is chosen by the direct vote of the people. Not so in Russia. The executives of each Province are chosen by and are responsible to the provincial soviet, which, as I have already indicated, is a body that is not elected by the people.

I shall not pursue the matter further with the lesser organizations in Russia, other than to say that, while the people in the United States vote for their executive officers in precinct, in village, and in county, all the executive officers, from the local soviet through the urban and village soviets up to the county soviets, are chosen not by the people but by the soviets themselves of the region over which they are expected to preside.

REPRESENTATION.

From what I have said in the matter of the pyramidal system by which the power of the party in control is built up in Russia and from what I shall point out a little later when I shall speak of the franchise and in which it will be shown that craft groups, soldiers, and sailors are favored in unusual degree, we need not be surprised in turning to the basis of representation in the legislative bodies of Russia under the soviet system to find that this basis of representation is such as to place as much of the responsibility as possible in the groups of laborers who are organized by trades and in the hands of soldiers and sailors and as little as possible in the hands of the farmers.

I have prepared again what I have called the deadly parallel, and again I want you to "look on this picture and then on this"—the one being the method of apportioning representation to the legislative bodies in Russia and the other the method of apportioning representation to the legislative bodies in the United States:

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION IN THE LEGISLATIVE BODIES OF RUSSIA (UNDER SOVIET SYSTEM) AND THE UNITED STATES.

The deadly parallel.

RUSSIA.	UNITED STATES.
All Russian Congress of Soviets.	Senate.
Members chosen by—	Two Senators elected from each State.
1. Urban soviets (cities and towns). (One member elected for every 25,000 voters.)	House of Representatives.
2. Provincial soviets (representing urban and country population). (One member elected for every 125,000 inhabitants.)	Representatives chosen from States on basis of population (farmers sharing equally in government with city population).
Regional.	No similar body in United States.
Regional soviet is made up of— 1. One representative for every 5,000 city voters; and 2. One representative for every 25,000 inhabitants of the county.
Provincial.	State.
Provincial soviet is made up of— 1. One representative for every 2,000 voters in the city; and 2. One representative for every 10,000 inhabitants of rural districts.	State senators apportioned by counties or on basis of population. State representatives apportioned on basis of population.

In Russia the overwhelming majority of people are farmers, and only 6 of the 50 Provinces have any considerable population engaged in nonrural industries. Lenin and Trotski when they seized control knew that if they were to retain their control and pass it on to others capable of thinking along similar lines it would be necessary for them to work out a system by which the craftsmen and the men in the army and navy would have an unfair and undue share in the representation in the legislative bodies. Accordingly we find the constitution solemnly declaring that one member to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, if he shall represent city people, shall be elected for every 25,000 voters, and if he shall represent provincial people—the farmers—one member shall represent 125,000 inhabitants. The constitution uses the word "voter" as applied to the city dweller, but "inhabitant" as applied to the country. The reason is plain. The farmer must be disfranchised. Remember, now, that both men and women over 18 years of age under certain conditions may vote. In the city is where we find the large groups of men and women who are working in factories or in mines or mills and who are unattached. In and near the city is where we find the soldiers. This is where we find the sailors. In the cities of Russia we will find the very people for whose interest the soviet government exists, and it is for that reason that the constitution is so drafted as to give the city dweller of Russia a greater representation in their All-Russian Congress of Soviets than is given to the farmers.

Notice further that the population of the city is figured in with the population of the country for the basis of province representation, thus giving an additional double representation to the city.

Now, when you go to the regional unit in Russia you find the same principle applied. One representative to the city dweller is given to every 5,000 voters, while the county as a whole is given one representative for every 25,000 inhabitants.

Notice again that the city population is included in making up the county population, and thus has an additional double representation.

And when you go to the provincial unit the city dweller is given one representative in the provincial soviet for every 2,000 voters, while the farmers are given one representative for every 10,000 inhabitants.

Examine the constitutions of all countries that pretend to be civilized and you will not find a more flagrant abuse in the organic act of apportionment of representation among the people than you will find in the constitution of the soviet government of Russia. Do those who urge that system in the United States propose to disfranchise the farmers of the United States? Is that part of their theory? Or shall we assume, as I have assumed, that those who have carelessly spoken words of approval of the soviet system are not aware of the plan that they have so lightly indorsed?

FURTHER DISCRIMINATIONS.

I have pointed out that the soviet government is organized so as to deliberately eliminate the farmer. And I now come to another instance in point. I have said that the All-Russian Congress of Soviets is chosen by the urban soviets and the provincial soviets. But the urban soviets are elected by city folks alone, while city and country folks unite to elect the provincial soviets. That gives the city people double representation and cuts down correspondingly the representation of the country.

The same principle applies to the regional soviet. The members of the regional are elected by the urban and county soviets. The city voters elect the urban soviets and then through the urban soviets have a part in electing the county soviets. The whole scheme is devised and worked out to take away from the farming communities political power and to vest it in the hands of soldiers and sailors and craft groups.

CLASS AGAINST CLASS.

One of the most striking features of the Russian constitution is that which has to do with representation from the standpoint of political units or groups of people through which may be had an expression of opinion.

In all kinds of orderly government heretofore men have been intrusted with responsibility because they have stood for a policy; their position might be affirmative or it might be negative, but at least their position was comparable.

This is the system that obtains in France, Italy, Great Britain, Switzerland, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and in the United States. It is the system that it seems commends itself to thoughtful people everywhere. There are variations in the terms through which the system is worked out, but, after all, the one principle is held in view that people should have the opportunity of acting as units of thought. This principle is applied in the county when the issue is whether or not a system of county roads shall be built. It is applied in the State on State issues, and it is applied in the National Government. Accordingly, the people of our great land have learned to think on big subjects as well as upon little subjects. We have learned to think on issues that confront the Nation and the world as well as issues that confront the precinct and the county.

In Russia it is solemnly set forth in the constitution that the representation accorded to the people shall come from the class to which they belong; that is, a group of carpenters in a city shall elect a carpenter to the soviet, the blacksmiths shall elect a man who can swing a hammer, the painters shall elect one of their own group, while the farmers shall elect a farmer.

Here is a distinctive feature of the soviet system, and let us analyze it. What does it mean? It means selfish interest, pure and simple. It means self-interest magnified to the nth power. It means that the carpenter, as he considers a candidate for the urban soviet, shall have in mind not Russia, not a Province of Russia, not a county, but a little group of carpenters in the particular community which selects a member to the urban soviet. It means that the blacksmith will not think of the interests of carpenters or peasants, that he will not think of the interests of all Russia or the regional or provincial group, but that he will think of the interests selfishly of those who work at the forge.

It means that the farmer will shut his eyes to the well-being of everything else in his country and think of nothing but the welfare of the farmer of Russia.

It means in its last analysis selfishness to a degree unheard of, and it means disintegration of national sentiment and of national power. No people can be taught to look in and not out without becoming narrow, selfish, suspicious of others.

Now, it is urged in behalf of this system that every trade and craft is thereby given representation, but let us look a little further. I have already shown from the constitution that the people vote merely for the members of the urban soviet in the city and the rural local soviet in the country. These people, it is true, are limited in their choice of representation to a member of the craft to which they belong, but when the local soviet elects to the county soviet or when the county and urban soviets elect to the provincial or regional soviet or when the regional and urban soviets elect to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets there is absolutely no limitation in their choice, and the members of the county soviet under the Russian constitution could all be carpenters or blacksmiths, and so could the members of the provincial, the regional, and the All-Russian Congress of Soviets. What, then, becomes of the government that recognizes each trade group? Under that system how can there be a more generous distribution of people in legislative bodies from among the trades than there is under our own system in our State, in our Nation?

I look around this Chamber and I see the Members here who have come direct from various trades or crafts.

There is my able friend from Ohio, Mr. COOPER, who stepped from the cab of a locomotive in order to assume the oath of office as a Member of this body. There is McLANE, of Pennsylvania, and there is CARSS, of Minnesota, both of them locomotive engineers. There is my friend Mr. BURKE, of Pennsylvania, who was a train conductor.

There is my friend Mr. WHITE, of Kansas, a farmer, and so is GANDY, of South Dakota, and LARSEN, of Georgia, and RIDDICK, of Montana; there is Mr. HUDSPETH, of Texas, who is in the cattle business.

Here is Dr. FESS, an eminent educator and who came to the Halls of Congress from a college presidency.

There is my friend NOLAN, of California, who hung upon the peg the apron of a molder when he came here to assume the responsibility of a Member of this body.

Representative SUMMERS, of Washington, is a physician and so is Representative LAZARO, of Louisiana, and Representative LAYTON, of Delaware. UPSHAW is a minister, and DAVEY, of Ohio, is a tree doctor.

Here are business men, here are men from the ranks of teachers, and here are lawyers.

More than that, I look about this body and I see men who have lived amid such surroundings as would bring them into contact with every interest of all our people.

McKENZIE, of Illinois; SMITH, of Idaho; TIMBERLAKE and TAYLOR, of Colorado; QUIN, of Mississippi; REBER, of Pennsylvania; and our highly esteemed former Speaker, CHAMP CLARK, were farmer boys; while MORIN, of Pennsylvania, in his early life was an employee in a glass factory; GARLAND was an iron puddler; and our distinguished floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, drove the pick in the mines of Wyoming.

RANDALL, of California, was a railway mail clerk. Representatives OSBORNE, of California, and JOHNSON, of Washington, and FOCHT, of Pennsylvania, worked at the printer's trade.

No, our Congress is made up of men who have seen all sides of life; and I have in mind the statement made not long ago by our beloved Uncle JOE CANNON, who as a boy and young man did the hardest kind of manual labor, that practically all of the Members of this body have gone through the period of physical toil in order to attain that which has come to them.

These men are directly representative of the people of this country.

No, gentlemen, our system means that every carpenter, that every blacksmith will have in view the broad vision of his country, of his State, of his county, and that every American citizen will be able to assume the responsibility of citizenship that recognizes something broader and larger than the selfish interests that are wrapped around the particular profession or trade or craft with which he happens to be identified. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, if the issue of the town pump is the absorbing issue to the people of the United States, the issue of the town pump in the little hamlet in Maine or in Florida or in Idaho, if that issue is greater than the well-being of State government, if that issue is greater than the question of whether or not we shall have a league of nations, whether or not we shall have a broad policy carried on through our Agriculture Department looking to the building up of agricultural resources, if that question is bigger and greater—the question of the town pump—than the question of a tariff policy that will mean a living wage for the workmen of the United States, if it is bigger than the question of intriguing alliances between the United States and foreign countries, then, gentlemen, and only then, would the soviet system, as it recognizes craft units instead of thought units, be better for the people of our country than our present system.

But I do not so believe. I believe by giving the American farmers, carpenters, miners the right to vote for a Member of the House of Representatives, for the governor of the State, for electors who will select a definite man for President we help the farmer, the carpenter, or the miner to become broad in his vision and to look out far beyond the fields that are bounded by his own fences or the workbench upon which his tools lie or the tunnel in which he drives his pick. It is only in the discussion of big things that our people can become large, broad-minded, and capable. It is only by the consideration of problems that have bearing upon the welfare of men and women, not only of my own home but 3,000 miles removed from the place where I live, that I can become the highest type of American citizen or that citizens in your State can respond to that which they ought to respond to under our type of government.

THE FRANCHISE.

In a government that has been heralded so widely as being the most profound experiment in democracy that has ever been undertaken we would naturally expect that the franchise would be along lines that would recognize all mankind embraced within the citizenship of the nation as standing upon an equal footing. The United States has for many years adhered to that principle. It was that principle largely for which our fathers died when they established our Government, and yet that principle seems foreign to the way of thinking of Lenin and Trotski as they shaped the Russian constitution.

Now, may I draw the deadly parallel of the franchise as it exists in Russia under the soviet system according to the constitution and as it exists in the United States:

THE FRANCHISE UNDER THE SOVIET SYSTEM IN RUSSIA AND IN THE UNITED STATES.

The deadly parallel.

RUSSIA.	UNITED STATES.
1. The franchise extends to all over 18 years of age who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and also persons engaged in housekeeping for the former. 2. Soldiers of the Army and Navy. 3. The former two classes when incapacitated. Disfranchised and not eligible for office: 1. Persons who employ hired labor in order to obtain from it an increase in profits. 2. Persons who have an income without doing any work, such as interest from capital, receipts from property, etc. 3. Private merchants, trade and commercial brokers. 4. Monks and clergy of all denominations. 5. Employees and agents of the former police, the gendarme corps, and the Czar's secret service; also members of the former reigning dynasty. 6 and 7. Persons unfit on account of mental ailment or criminal record.	The franchise extends to men in all States (and women in many States, and soon in all) who are citizens and over 21 years of age, less those disfranchised on account of illiteracy, mental ailment, or criminal record.

Bear in mind the liberal franchise with which the American Nation meets her citizens and let me ask you to contemplate the franchise that is handed out to the people of Russia. All people of Russia who are 18 years of age or over who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and persons engaged in housekeeping in behalf of the former are entitled to the franchise. Who else? The soldiers of the army and navy. Who else? Any of the former two classes who have become incapacitated.

Now turn to the next sections of the Russian constitution and see who are disfranchised.

The merchant is disfranchised; ministers of all denominations are disfranchised; and then, while condemning the Czar for tyranny, the soviet constitution solemnly declares that those who were in the employ of the Czar or had been members of certain military and police groups and the members of the families of those who had ruled in Russia for many generations shall be denied suffrage.

Persons who have income from capital or from property that is theirs by reason of years of frugality, industry, and thrift are penalized by being denied the right to vote. They are placed in the class with criminals, while the profligate, the tramp who works enough to obtain the means by which he can hold body and soul together, is able to qualify under the constitution of Russia and is entitled to a vote. Under that system in the United States the loyal men and women who bought Liberty bonds in their country's peril would be disfranchised while the slacker would have the right of suffrage.

Persons who employ hired labor in order to obtain from it an increase in profits may not vote or hold office. Under that system the manufacturer who furnishes employment for a thousand men would be denied the ballot, while those in his employ could freely exercise the right of franchise. Under that system the farmer who hires a crew of men to help him harvest his crop is denied the franchise. Under that system the dairyman who hires a boy to milk his cows or to deliver milk is denied the franchise.

The farmer is discriminated against, especially in the fixing of the groups of people who are disfranchised under this last provision to which I have directed attention.

Does the soldier employ labor? No.

Does the sailor employ labor? No.

Does the craftsman employ labor? Not generally.

In the cities those who are interested in industrial lines are very few in comparison with the craftsmen, the soldiers, and the sailors; but how about the country? We know that every successful farmer now and then needs to employ additional labor. He needs to employ it when he puts in his crop; sometimes he employs it when he is caring for the crop; usually he must employ it when the harvest season is on. Now, what does this mean? It means that in all Russia every farmer who has gumption enough to continue his business along such lines as make it necessary that he employ so much as one man to help him in his work when the services of that man are of assistance in increasing the income of the farmer is disfranchised.

No; the whole scheme, with all the other iniquities that I have indicated, is a deliberate plan to eliminate the farmers, the peasants of Russia, from a share in their government.

But this provision of the constitution is more deadly still. It crushes out all progress, all ambition. The carpenter who would like to take a contract and employ men to help him in his work must forfeit his right to vote. The blacksmith who is enterprising and puts a second forge and anvil into his shop and employs a helper must forfeit his franchise. The farmer who is frugal and thrifty and industrious, and who employs another man to help him put in his crop or tend it or harvest it, thereby loses his right to vote. Why, gentlemen, here is a system that chains men down; here is a system that makes men slaves; here is a system that puts a premium on sloth and indolence and stupidity, and chains the hands of him who would arise.

OTHER AMAZING FEATURES.

The constitution of Russia adopts the declaration of rights as part of the organic act to the extent that changes have not been made by the constitution. Examining them—the constitution and the declaration of rights—we find other most astounding doctrines in the soviet fundamental law. I shall not discuss but merely mention only a few of them. They do not pertain so much to the structure of government as they do to the economic and social conditions surrounding the people under the soviet system:

First. Private ownership of land is abolished. (No compensation, open or secret, is paid to the former owner.)

Second. Civil marriage alone is legal.

1. By act of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets a marriage may be accomplished by the contracting parties declaring the fact orally or by writing to the department of registry of marriage.

2. Divorce is granted by petition of both or either party upon proof alone that divorce is desired.

Third. The teaching of religious doctrines is forbidden in private schools as well as in schools that are public.

Fourth. No church or religious society has the right to own property. (The soviet leaders boldly proclaim the home and the church as the enemies of their system, and from the foregoing it would seem that they are trying to destroy them.)

Fifth. Under the general authority granted to the soviets by the constitution inheritance of property by law or will has been abolished.

These amazing features of the constitution and laws enacted under the constitution speak more eloquently than any words that could be used to amplify them in portraying the hideousness of a system of government that, if permitted to continue, must inevitably crush out the home in large part by the flippancy with which marriage and divorce are regarded, by the refusal of permitting the land to be held in private ownership, and by refusing the parent the right at death to pass on to his wife or to his children the fruits of years of toil. Furthermore, the constitution has gone as far as it seems it could go in the effort to wipe out religious thought and to make Russia an atheistic nation. No church or religious society may own property, and religious doctrines which could properly be barred from public schools may not be taught in even a private school. That means that the home, shattered and wrecked as it is, shall be the only center in which religious ideas may be reasonably considered and there can be no general and systematic comparison of religious views, or culture, refinement, and purity of life attained through their general consideration.

A PYRAMID OF TYRANNY.

Gentlemen, if what I have said in analyzing the Russian soviet constitution is amazing; if the disfranchisement of the people by arrangement of representation in the soviets and by the withholding of suffrage is startling; if the provisions to which I have just referred pertaining to the ownership of land, inheritance, limitations on religious teachings are hideous, there is one feature still that is impossible in connection with a government of people who would be free.

I refer to the language of the constitution that specifically provides that in a pyramidal manner the power of each soviet increases from the small unit to the higher until in the All-Russian Congress of Soviets complete and absolute authority has been conferred. This feature of the constitution is so amazing that I want you to hear me read the three sections of the constitution which confer this tyrannous power. Remember in connection with this how far removed from the vote of the people are those intrusted with the power conferred. I read:

SEC. 12. The supreme power of the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic belongs to the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, and, in periods between the convocation of the Congress, to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

SEC. 50. Besides the above-mentioned questions (broad powers conferred specifically in sec. 49), the All-Russian Congress and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee have charge of all other affairs which, according to their decision, require their attention.

SEC. 62. The congresses of soviets and their executive committees have the right to control the activity of the local soviets (i. e., the regional congress controls all soviets of the respective regions; the provincial, of the respective province, with the exception of the urban soviets, etc.); and the regional and provincial congresses and their executive committees, in addition, have the right to overrule the decisions of the soviets of their districts, giving notice in important cases to the central soviet authority.

What I have said in analyzing the Russian soviet system is upon the assumption that the constitution is adhered to and that the provisions of the government, such as they are, are faithfully followed throughout Russia. Disgraceful and tyrannical as the system would be were it carried out according to the letter of the soviet constitution, the cold, bare fact is that the soviet constitution is not respected by those who are trusted with responsibility under it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. I thank the gentleman for this courtesy.

Gentlemen, in a system in which the executive authority is so far removed from the people, the executives have not hesitated in their arbitrary rule to exercise this function of government. All over the part of Russia that is dominated by the soviet government terrorism prevails, and the terrorism emanates from the central authority of government as it is represented in Lenin and Trotski.

Local elections are held, and those in authority furnish the particular ballots to those who are the mere tools or puppets of Lenin and Trotski, and they deposit the ballots in the ballot box under the watchful eyes of those who have the election in charge. Then if the election has not resulted in the way in which the authorities desire, no matter if those elected to the soviet are earnestly and faithfully responding to the will of the people who elected them, the soviet is dissolved and a new election must be held.

I could cite in this connection the instance in one city where an American with whom I am acquainted spent many months, where the local soviet had been regularly chosen and where the executive officers of the local soviet were administering the affairs under the jurisdiction of the soviet in response to the public sentiment of the community, but not in accordance with the wishes of Lenin and Trotski. It was not long until a representative of the executive committee of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets visited the city to which I refer, and those who had been intrusted with responsibility by the people and the members of the urban soviet were ousted from office and a soviet that was in line and in harmony with Lenin and Trotski was chosen in its place.

Another man with whom I am acquainted, but who is a native of Russia and is familiar with the entire system, told me that there is no limit to the authority of the executive officers of all Russia, "other," said he, "than the amount of powder in their guns and the distance to which their rifle bullet will carry."

THE SYSTEM IN PRACTICE.

In maintaining this system it would be commonplace for me to cite instance after instance like that to which I have called attention. The papers have been filled with it, the magazines have told of it. I have talked with man after man who has come back from Russia and the same story is theirs. Not only are elections set aside and not only are the people dominated in this high-handed way, but all who dare to stand in the path of the all-powerful executive committee of the Russian Government are dealt with most ruthlessly. Men and women are murdered by the officers of the Government for no other reason than that they are opposed to the soviet system. Indeed, more than that, the relatives of men who have had the courage of their convictions have been murdered because, forsooth, they happened to have kinsmen who were brave enough to stand out in their communities against the Russian system. This high-handed system of butchery and death that has prevailed for more than two years has been carried on to such an extent that in large part the educated, the thoughtful, the well trained men and women of Russia have been exterminated or have been driven from the country. These are not idle tales; these are the reports and statements that come to us from those who have had the opportunity of close observation in Russia, no matter whether they have been Russians themselves or citizens of other countries who have had the opportunity or the dread privilege of spending months in Russia during the régime of Lenin and Trotski.

More than that, the very system has reflected itself upon the industrial life of Russia. It was ushered in as a system that would be the panacea for labor disturbances, that would mean equality among the people of Russia, but what has been the result of the system? Before the system was adopted, even in spite of two or three years of war in which Russia had been constantly engaged, her factories were operating, her railroads were being administered, her cities filled with populous throngs, and albeit the hardship of war was present, Russia was a live nation, but what is the situation to-day? Factories have been closed or destroyed until at this time there is only a small percentage of factories and mills of Russia in operation in comparison with those that were running only two years ago at the beginning of the soviet régime.

The railroad systems of Russia have been so badly crippled that to-day the soviet government can not find men to equip properly one-tenth of the engines upon the tracks.

More than that, the artisans, the mechanics, the trained and skilled workers of Russia who are not being used in the army and navy for the purpose of keeping down and intimidating the peasants and other right-thinking people are being used for the most part in the factories that are turning out munitions of war with which to support the autocratic power of Lenin and Trotski.

The whole history of Russia for the last two years has been that of a saturnalia of financial, of social, of industrial ruin, with all that those words imply. Worse than that, for following Lenin and Trotski into authority rode the four horsemen of the Apocalypse—War, Famine, Pestilence, and Death—and the population of Petrograd, the capital of Russia, has been reduced in two years from more than 2,000,000 to between 500,000 and 750,000 people to-day. The population of other fair cities and splendid country settlements has been woefully chastised. Famine, hunger, disease—these are raising havoc in all the parts of Russia that are under the rule of the soviet; and through the curse of that despotic system—the brute force of Bolshevism that is masking in the name of democracy—untold thousands of that brave people are forfeiting their lives because they stand for law and order and decency in government.

THE ARRAIGNMENT.

What, then, is my arraignment of sovietism according to the soviet constitution?

1. The people have no direct vote or voice in government, except the farmers in their local rural soviets and the city dwellers in their urban soviets.

2. The rural, county, provincial, regional, and all-Russian soviets are elected indirectly, and the people have no direct vote in the election.

3. The people have no voice in the election of executive officers of the highest or lowest degree.

4. There is no mention of justice or judicial officers in the constitution.

5. The people are very largely disfranchised.

6. The farmer of Russia is discriminated against:

(a) Equal representation is denied him.

(b) He may vote for only the members of the local rural soviet, not for rural, county, provincial, regional, or All-Russian Congress of Soviets.

(c) The farmer who employs any profitable labor is disfranchised.

(d) The city voter has a double voice in electing the regional and all-Russian soviets.

7. The system raises class against class; the voters vote by trade and craft groups instead of on the basis of thought units.

(a) This means rank selfishness.

(b) It kills national and even provincial and county interest or loyalty.

8. The system strikes a blow at the church and the home.

9. The system is pyramidal and means highly centralized and autocratic power.

How much of Russia is under soviet jurisdiction?

The boundary line is not clearly marked. It is my judgment, however, that all of Siberia refuses to bow to Lenin and Trotski. The southern part of Russia is practically free from the soviet system. Poland is free. The western Provinces on the Baltic refuse to yield, and a rather indefinite region in the northern part of Russia resists the extension of the soviet system. In my judgment, 90 per cent of the people of Russia are opposed to the system, and, in my judgment, an overwhelming majority of the people of the part of Russia that is under the control of the soviet government are opposed to the rule of Lenin and Trotski. This is borne out by the testimony of writers of Russian birth, of those who have fought the old battles for freedom within Russia, who have spent months and years in Russia and have seen that country in good days and in bad and who understand the true sentiment of the people of that unhappy land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that the gentleman had any time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield it to the gentleman from Nevada if he desires to yield it to the gentleman from Idaho. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I am under obligations to my friend from Nevada.

A WORD IN CONCLUSION.

I have only a short word in conclusion. I believe that it was Carlyle who said that the best kind of government in the world would be the kind of government that could be presided over by one man, provided the one man were wise enough and good enough to control. The trouble is you can not find the one man, and if you could find the one man the fact that he does not have immortality would make the type of rule that he would administer unwise because it would come to an end, and when the end should come the people would suffer because they would be unfamiliar with the way of administering their government.

My country under the representative system may make mistakes day after day and year after year, but I prefer still that government rather than a government in the United States presided over by one man or by a set of men who make no mistakes. No man could live forever, and after his death chaos would be in our land, because the people would be untrained.

No; the soviet system of government can not be defended. It is against the interests of the very men for whom it is supposed to have been established—the laboring man. He is the man most of all who must suffer under any kind of government or system that is wrong. He is the man who would be out of bread within the shortest time. He is the man whose family would be destitute of clothing in the shortest time. He is the man whose family will suffer most through disease, famine, and pestilence in the shortest time.

As it is against the best interest of the laboring man, so it is against the best interest of all our people, and, as a matter of fact, the overwhelming mass of people of this country and all countries is made up of laboring people.

In spite of statements of agitators, in spite of leniency that we accord even the anarchist and I. W. W. speaker who denounces our Government to uphold and exploit the features of the soviet system, I take it that the great rank and file of Americans hold closely wrapped up in their souls that which represents the cost price of free government in America and that they are not going to throw away their birthright or sell it for a mess of pottage. They turn back in the traditions of their families and they see vividly and live over again the trials, hardships, suffering, and death of the fathers of the Revolution, who purchased our Government for us. They follow through the sufferings at Valley Forge, they see the sacrifice at Bunker Hill and at Yorktown, they see the struggle of free people everywhere, they follow through the struggles again that our country has been asked to bear from the days of the establishment of representative government until to-day. Our present generation is largely represented, and for another 50 years must be largely represented, and dominated by those who have had part in the heroic struggle in the last few years for the preservation of the liberty of the world. For what did our boys fight at St. Mihiel, the Argonne, and Belleau Wood? Was it for the soviet system of government? No; a thousand times no. Rather it was for a system of government where the ideals of free peoples prevail, where there is freedom of religious worship, where there is no stricture upon the conscience of man, where there is liberty of voice and the press, where justice is administered to all alike, and where the people, regardless of race or creed, regardless of religious or political thought, may have the right of an equal share in the responsibilities of government.

Gentlemen, they fought and they died for America, whose Government in warp and woof was created for the people, is of the people, and is maintained by the people of our splendid land. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, the very last clause of the first paragraph provides that this shall be ascertained, determined, and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I asked permission a while ago to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words on the subject of popular unrest in the United States. This is a subject that I believe it will be conceded I have some small qualifications to speak on. I am in close touch with the laboring classes throughout the entire country and have reason to believe that I have their confidence. I come from a great industrial district. I have recently spent my vacation in intimate intercourse with my constituents, with the people who work in my district, and I think I clearly understand their ideals and point of view.

THE UNREST IS INDUSTRIAL, NOT POLITICAL.

That there is unrest is obvious. This unrest is industrial and not political. It is of great importance that we preserve this distinction, otherwise we can not hope to understand and to remedy it. There is, of course, some political unrest also. We have always had it more or less. Perhaps it is now somewhat greater than heretofore, but it is as yet comparatively trifling and is no cause for serious alarm. Political unrest to the present is substantially nonexisting. Industrial unrest, however, is widely prevalent, serious, and demands prompt attention and immediate remedy.

The prevailing industrial unrest may be converted into political unrest if it is met with or sought to be suppressed by political measures. But, as I have said, at present undoubtedly it is almost purely industrial in every aspect. Not one workingman out of ten thousand is dissatisfied with fundamental Americanism or has any desire to change the principles of our Government or would have any thought of trying to overthrow the American Government by force. To the contrary, the men who work with their hands in the United States, the great masses of the people, are the strong bulwark of the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. They conceive that they are, and should be, the peculiar defenders of those principles, because they are the large and peculiar beneficiaries of them. They consider themselves as deriving special benefits from the American form of government. They hold, as does no other class, to the ideals of self-government, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and they prize beyond all material things the fundamentals of trial by jury, due process of law, free speech and free press, freedom of religion, of opinion, and of the right of assemblage.

Why, gentlemen, if a class should arise in our country and attempt to do violence to the things which you and I recognize and love as the principles for which our fathers fought and which America achieved by her independence, there is not one workingman out of ten thousand in America, young or old, but would gladly lay down his life in defense of his country.

Of course, there is political discontent as there has always been. There are no doubt some misguided spirits who dream of violence and disorder, a radical few who would seek to inaugurate class rule. They are found almost wholly in the big cities and among those foreign-born who do not yet fully know our country. But at heart the workingman and farmer are sound and true in their Americanism. The charge against their loyalty and devotion springs from ignorance or worse.

UNREST GROSSLY MAGNIFIED.

It is a great mistake to magnify the unrest in the country and represent it as being of a political nature; it is worse than foolish. I regret to have heard even in this Chamber echoes of the widespread propaganda which is being carried on to the effect that a large part of the working people are disloyal to our institutions. Every time there is a serious labor dispute I hear it said that "Bolshevism has come to America." If a set of workingmen try to get wages responsive to the increase in the cost of living, they are called "I. W. W.s." If they dare to talk the idealism that characterized our great Nation during the recent war, they are called "revolutionists." And so on and on, these epithets are cast at men who are innocent of disloyalty, not merely by the parasite newspapers, but even in this Chamber.

I deplore this propaganda magnifying unrest beyond words, because it tends to convert it from industrial unrest into political unrest. It tends to make real the political unrest which is now almost wholly imaginary. I repeat, the masses are loyal to America; they will preserve Americanism with their lives; their dissatisfaction is with the abuse and perversion of American opportunities, with excrescences on Americanism, with the greed, monopoly, and exploitation which aim to defeat real Americanism. These they would meet and destroy, not by violence but by lawful American methods.

The causes of the existing industrial unrest are obvious. Wages have not generally risen to correspond to the cost of living. The increase in the cost of living is somewhere about 80 per cent since 1914. Wages on the whole average have not increased above 40 per cent. I made some calculations and collected the facts a few months ago, which I am satisfied are fairly correct, which showed that the increase in wages had been only 34½ per cent since July, 1914. The war being over, men who work for wages feel that their wages ought to go forward to meet the increase in the cost of living, and when they are met by a stone wall of opposition and the determination of the big employers to fight them to the death there is a resulting unrest, of course. They consider that as the war was fought to substitute justice for might and to make the world safe for the small and weak, some recognition of the brotherhood of man should be shown by their employers, and they are dissatisfied with the cynicism with which their employers meet their desire for some measure of democracy in industry.

PROFITEERING THE CHIEF CAUSE.

Again, the profiteers are abroad in this land. Laboring men made heavy sacrifices to carry on the war. They made their sacrifices in a spirit of patriotism excelled in no other class. They came out of the war with much less than many other classes. Labor did not profiteer; it is a slander on labor to say that it profiteered during the war. Labor has not profiteered; it has been and still is the chief victim of the profiteer. Generally the big employers made immense profits out of the war and filled their pockets full of money. Their employees, knowing this, accepted the situation with the best patience they could muster during the war when the welfare of the country required it, but now that the war is over and the employers' profits go on, they see no reason why a division of these profits should not be made with them. Labor is tired of being preyed upon by profiteers; labor feels like demanding wages in keeping with the cost of living; labor desires that the human element be considered and that it be no longer held as a mere commodity. Labor is dissatisfied, yes; but disloyal to America, no, a thousand times no!

Now, to return to my point. It is a great mistake to magnify the popular unrest. It is more than a mistake; it is a serious wrong against our country to affect to believe that the dissatisfaction which comes from economic causes is due to a lack of patriotism and Americanism. Such charges are calculated to produce the very disloyalty which we would avoid. Governmental measures based upon such a false assumption amount almost to criminal folly. By such action and such injustice governments may shake even the stoutest patriotism—they may strain the surest fidelity.

"SIDE SWIPING LABOR."

I can understand why it goes on in the newspapers. Apart from their passion for sensationalism, for excitement, and hubbub, they are under the control of the big employers, and it is a way to side swipe labor to say "you are disloyal." Its purpose is to alienate from the wage earners the sympathies of the general public so that the workers may become easier prey to those who wish to exploit them. I understand why the newspaper propaganda is carried on, but I can not understand why it should be echoed here, and I hope that the aspersions which have been cast on men who work will cease.

I want to speak a word of warning. The way to convert industrial unrest into political unrest is to attempt to suppress it by political measures. If you undertake to suppress the lawful and reasonable aspirations of men who work by the strong hand of the law, it will be dangerous, I fear. Let us not engage in dangerous experiments in dealing with the reasonable discontent of our citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, if our Government, by its legislative, judicial, or executive branches, shall do anything to cause men who work to feel that they can not expect a fair deal from their Government, we will be doing a dangerous thing. The workingman must have faith that can not be shaken—that he can look to his representatives and to executives and courts for justice and for a square deal in his disputes with his employer. A few actions such as have been recently taken in inept dealing with labor disputes can do more to produce political discontent, dissatisfaction, and disloyalty than all of the pratings of agitators or disloyalists.

"LYING NEWSPAPERS."

I place most of the blame for existing unrest upon the newspapers. They seem to be largely giving themselves to magnifying and fomenting it. Always subservient to wealth and position, recent months have shown them in new depths of servility to the upper classes. They delight in scareheads and sensational articles upon evidences of unrest. The more reactionary the newspaper is the more vicious is its attempts to shake public confidence. Of course, it is a deliberate propaganda. Every labor disturbance is represented as the work of "aliens" or "I. W. W.s." Tales of disorder are collected from remote points, greatly exaggerated and charged to "reds." A riot, large or small, gets a scarehead as "attempted revolution." Radical literature is exploited and quoted from as evidence of "widespread anarchistic conspiracies."

Exaggeration and mystery are the keynotes of their policy. Unfortunately these dastard methods of molding public opinion have met with marked success. Though political discontent is comparatively nonexistent, the average unthinking citizen has been filled with the fear that America is on the brink of class war, anarchy, and revolution. The purpose of these newspapers is, of course, to gain for the big employers a temporary advantage over labor. In their stupidity they do not realize that such temporary present gain may have to be paid for with a heavy price in future. In their shortsightedness they see only the present hour. I wish that they might have eyes to see that the way to meet false agitation is with the truth, and to meet well-founded agitation is with fair compromise and concession. The way to meet industrial unrest is with justice and a square deal for the wage earner. There can be no permanent solution through other means.

THE BIRMINGHAM DAILIES.

The parasite newspapers "side swipe" the dissatisfied workingman by calling him an "alien" and his chosen labor officials "agitators" and "reds." They show no mercy either to the worker or his friends. If from patriotic or humanitarian motives a public or private citizen shows interest in the masses, concerns himself with their problems or gives them his confidence and support, no epithet is too vile for these newspapers to fling at him. They stop at nothing to discredit or destroy him. I read numerous newspapers. Bad as they are, they are all we have for current information. In my low opinion of them generally I hope I am not influenced by the viciousness and stupidity of the dailies of my home city, though the latter are below the average. As an illustration of their methods I refer to an instance which occurred during the recent brief vacation of Congress.

On November 30 I made a short speech in Birmingham at a meeting of workingmen held out of respect to me as their Representative. In reporting the speech the Age-Herald quoted me as having said, among other things:

> The fundamental principle of Americanism is for every man to have the same political right as the other man and the right of the whole people to have a voice in the Government.
> I am not in sympathy with the campaign that is being waged against the so-called aliens. These aliens are good enough to be brought over to this country, and they are good enough to remain here.
> The fight against them is just a blow at the workingman, for the alien, like the rest of us, is asking for the same rights and the added increase in wages, and is just as much one of us as the man who was born in this country. Then, why deport him?

"DELIBERATE FALSIFICATION" AND "LYING COMMENT."

The report was misleading and gave neither the words, purport, nor spirit of what I said, but it furnished the text of a vicious editorial attack on me in the News of December 1. Editor Glass, of the News, wrote the editorial himself. He was not present at the meeting. He did not verify the Age-Herald report, but did the unprecedented thing in journalism of accepting it as absolutely true and making it the basis of his attack. The Age-Herald report was misleading, but Glass, with characteristic venom and malice, deliberately falsified the report by lying comment upon it. After quoting that part of the Age-Herald report, Glass said:

> This view argues the speaker's entire sympathy with all the anarchistic aliens of the I. W. W. type, who have done so much in the past two years to injure the country of their adoption and to undermine the sanity, patriotism, and efficiency of true American laboring men. He would not see deported the men on the Pacific coast who from ambush have shot down former overseas patriots still wearing the uniform, because they were standing up for law and order, nor is he willing to see the Emma Goldmans and the thousands of other anarchists who have propagated the doctrines bearing that sort of fruit kicked out of the land whose freedom they have abused and whose liberty they have degenerated into license.

There were numerous false statements made in the editorial, but what I have read suffices to show its diabolical malice. What I really said was by way of comment on the steel strike. I said that Gary and his mouthpieces answered the strikers by calling them "aliens" and demanding their deportation if they would not return to work; that the Steel Trust had brought these men over from Europe to get the benefit of their labor, to take the jobs of American workingmen and to breakdown the standard of American wages and living, and now that they had become accustomed to America and its ideals and sought to raise themselves to American standards and to better their condition by going on a strike the cry was raised "they are aliens, deport them." I said that if these men were good enough to be brought over to take the jobs of American workingmen they were good enough to strike for decent wages and a decent living and as strikers were entitled to the same treatment that other strikers received.

In my speech I did not refer to anarchists, disloyalists, or criminals in any way, and certainly did not attempt to defend them. I expressed no opposition to the deportation of criminals or others subject thereto under our immigration laws. Neither at that time nor at any time have I defended crime, violence, or disorder by word or implication. Any criticism of me upon such grounds is malicious, venomous, and false.

But there is no falsehood to which the editor of the News would not stoop to do me an injury. I have had previous experiences with the News and the Age-Herald. They sought diligently to destroy me during the 1918 campaign. The recent instance is but a repetition of their dastardly attacks. During that campaign the News published similar editorials to its recent attack on me. The Age-Herald published vicious and stupid cartoons of me almost daily and, in self-defense, I was compelled to bring a libel suit against it. This suit was recently tried before a jury and a judgment of $30,000 damages awarded me. I called the trial of my suit "a school of decency and manners." There seemed no other way to teach the Age-Herald these qualities. I am hoping that it may be benefited by its tuition fee.

THE REMEDY FOR UNREST.

It is time for the newspapers and those who control their policies to leave off dollar grabbing and playing for petty temporary advantage and look forward to the security of our country. They decry class prejudice in others, yet in their own small class of a favored few stand together like one man. They hound all classes but their own. They are doing more by their methods to provoke class consciousness and class solidarity than all other influences. They are rapidly driving the masses to a realization of the necessity of class action for their own protection. Of course I deplore class strife, but how can I discourage class consciousness among the masses when that seems to be the only way by which they can defend themselves against a small, domineering, class-conscious group which holds as its supreme precept "one for all and all for one" in its dealings with the masses. I would bid big business men and their editors and parasites to look upward, to hold a little to humanitarianism, to know "that none serves himself so well as he who serves his fellow man, and none serves his country so well as he who labors for reasonable equality among all its citizens in right, privilege, and opportunity."

Unrest provoked by injustice is righteous. Men do good work as free men, not as slaves. The remedy for unfounded discontent is not the gag, but reason and fair argument, and for righteous discontent not the iron hand of the law but justice and a square deal.

Loyalty can not be compelled. We may always trust the citizen to love and defend the government which deserves to be loved and defended.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, an antidumping proposition is not a new one. The Democrats were the first to introduce and to pass an antidumping proposition. I congratulate the Republicans on having followed the Democratic example. The Underwood bill, as reported to the House and as passed by the House, every Democrat voting for it, contained an antidumping provision almost exactly like the provision in this bill, except that it limited the amount of additional or special duty to 15 per cent—that is, to the difference between the sales price here and the market price in the country from which imported, but in no case to exceed 15 per cent—and provided further that no additional duty should be levied upon any article that already bore a duty of 50 per cent. This bill eliminates the limit. When the Underwood bill went to the Senate, the Senate struck out the antidumping provision.

In the act of 1916, which the Democratic Congress enacted, we have as stringent and as drastic an antidumping proposition as is contained in this bill, but the Tariff Commission thinks that it is not practically workable, that you can not administer it as easily as you can a provision like this. In the act of 1916 it is provided:

SEC. 801. That it shall be unlawful for any person importing or assisting in importing any articles from any foreign country into the United States, commonly and systematically to import, sell, or cause to be imported or sold such articles within the United States at a price substantially less than the actual market value or wholesale price of such articles, at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country of their production, or of other foreign countries to which they are commonly exported, after adding to such market value or wholesale price, freight, duty, and other charges and expenses necessarily incident to the importation and sale thereof in the United States: Provided, That such act or acts be done with the intent of destroying or injuring an industry in the United States, or of preventing the establishment of an industry in the United States, or of restraining or monopolizing any part of trade and commerce in such articles in the United States.

If an article is imported at a price substantially less than the price in the markets of the country of production or of other foreign countries to which it is commonly exported, while the act of 1916 does not provide, as this bill does, the levying of an additional duty, it does make it a criminal offense punishable by a fine of not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment of not to exceed one year, provided the importer does it with intent to injure or destroy an industry in the United States. The Tariff Commission declare that it is not workable, for the reason that it is almost impossible to show the intent on the part of the importer to injure or destroy business in the United States by such importation and sale.

That is the trouble with this antidumping act of 1916, which is now the law. You have to show the intent of the foreigner, the intent of the importer, to injure or destroy some particular industry in the United States. The business here might be injured, might be destroyed, by such importations and sales as effectively without such intent as with it. The purpose of this bill is to prevent such unfair competition by the importation of articles at a price below that prevailing in the market of the country from which imported by adding a special duty equal to the difference between the imported sale price here and the price or value in the principal markets of the country from which the article is imported.

You must remember that the present tariff act, as well as the Payne Act, the Dingley Act, and other tariff acts, base the ad valorem tariff, not upon the price which the importer pays, not upon the cost to him of the article, but upon the value or price of the article in the principal markets of the country in which it is purchased or from which it is imported. For instance, suppose I purchase an article to be imported here for $10 in Germany or France or Great Britain, and suppose that the value or price for which that article is sold in the principal markets of such country is $15. Under all of the tariff acts, the existing act as well as the others, the ad valorem tariff is based and calculated not upon what it costs me, $10, but upon the $15, the market value or price in such country. This bill provides for the levying of a special duty, in addition to the regular duty under existing law, which shall equal the difference between the import price or cost here and the price or value of the article in the principal markets of the country from which it is exported. For example, if the import price or cost is $10, and the value or price of the article in markets of the country of exportation is $10, the special duty would be $5. This bill, as the present act does, denounces such sales and importations as "unfair competition" with our domestic industries. We Democrats want competition, but we want fair competition. The Democrats favor and have provided a tariff that will prevent by any domestic industry a monopoly at home and also will prevent the foreigner from establishing a monopoly here. We tried to guard against unfair competition by the foreigner by the passage of the act of 1916. We are willing to have foreign goods coming over here in competition with American-made goods, but there must not be such a competition that will destroy the American industry and thus give the foreigner the monopoly. It must be fair competition. We believe that the industries of the United States can stand fair competition. We differ with the Republicans. The Republicans have no confidence in our American industries. They have no confidence in the genius, capacity, and resources of our American manufacturers. They have no confidence in the skill and efficiency of American labor.

They claim that every country on earth can make and sell goods cheaper than we can in the United States; that the foreign manufacturer can ship across the seas, pay freight to the interior, and undersell here our own manufacturers; that the labor of other countries, even the cheap labor of Japan and China, is more efficient than the high-priced skilled labor of America. We Democrats have more confidence in American industry, more confidence in the genius and business capacity of the American manufacturer; we have got more confidence in the efficiency and skill of American labor. Republicans demand a prohibitive tariff to prevent any foreign competition. Democrats favor a competitive tariff, a tariff that will admit fair competition. We have the confidence in American industry that it can stand, that it is able to meet fair competition from every quarter. We are willing, we are anxious, to guard American industry against all unfair competition. This bill does that.

In the Clayton Antitrust Act, which we Democrats passed, we provided against unfair competition among our domestic industries. We made it a criminal offense for a domestic industry to sell in one section of the country or to one purchaser at a different or lower price—excluding the difference in freight—than he sells in another section or to other purchasers for the purpose of lessening or destroying competition or establishing a monopoly. We made such an offense punishable by a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for one year in the penitentiary, or both. I will read the section:

That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia.

And so forth.

Now, if it be proper and just to protect our domestic industries against unfair competition by other domestic industries, why is it improper and unjust to protect all our domestic industries against the unfair competition of foreign industries?

I will say to the chairman of the committee that while the first section of the bill intends to cover the point raised a few moments ago by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], I am very doubtful if the language is sufficient to clear the matter and express what the committee really intended. Now, the first section reads this way:

That the "special duty" provided for in this act shall be levied upon all articles imported into the United States of a class or kind identical or comparable with a class or kind made or produced in the United States.

And so forth.

That was intended to prevent articles produced abroad from coming into unfair competition with similar articles produced here—produced here in substantial quantities. If there are no similar articles produced here in any substantial quantities, there is no use for this act to apply to such articles imported. Take, for instance, coffee. We produce no coffee here in substantial quantity, though we may produce a few pounds from hothouse plants. We want to get our coffee as cheaply as possible. There can be no "unfair competition," because we produce none with which the foreign coffee competes. We do not care if it sells for 25 cents a pound in Brazil or 25 cents a pound in other countries. It would be to our interest to get it for 5 cents a pound, if we could. Take tea. We have no tea industry here, though I believe a gentleman in South Carolina does produce a few pounds. By this bill we did not intend that such "special duty" should be levied on tea, if it should be imported here cheaper than it sells for in the country of exportation, because some tea, though only a few pounds, was produced here. The language in the bill might be construed by the Secretary of the Treasury to mean that if there were produced here any quantity, however small, of an article similar to the article imported, the special duty shall apply to such imported article.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Where no article is produced in this country, or substantially none, what would be the economic reason for the foreigner selling in this market at a less price than it is sold in his home market?

Mr. KITCHIN. There would not be any, unless there were two or more foreign countries competing with each other in this market.

For instance, if Japan and China were selling tea in competition here, they might sell for less here than the market price of tea in the respective countries.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. We do not desire to destroy competition between Japan and China in tea. We do not produce either. This act would not apply.

Mr. KITCHIN. With the suggested amendment it could not apply.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I entirely agree with what the gentleman from North Carolina has said, and I am sure it was not the intention of the committee to apply this language contained in the first paragraph, except where the article was made in substantial quantities in this country. My understanding is that the gentleman has an amendment to propose in that connection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have an amendment which will carry out exactly what the committee intended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Where does the gentleman propose to offer it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will offer it on page 5, at the end of and as a part of section 9, something like this:

This section shall not apply to any article the like of which is not produced in substantial quantities in the United States, the same to be determined, ascertained, and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman I do not think there will be any objection to an amendment of that kind being inserted somewhere in the bill, but I would like to have the gentleman consider for a moment as to whether it might not be better to insert it in paragraph 1, in the eighth line, after the words "United States"? Section 9 refers back to section 1 for the articles on which the duty is to be laid, and there are two provisions in section 1, or two classes, or two classes made one, and next, the kind identical or comparable with a class or kind made or produced in the United States, or of a kind sold in competition with articles made or produced in the United States in substantial quantities, or something of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would remind the gentleman that section 9 is the substantial effective section of the bill. It is the section that really levies the additional or special duty. I believe it would be better and clearer to add the amendment to that section. I believe with that amendment in every Democrat here can support this measure. It is certainly in keeping with the Democratic position with respect to antidumping propositions. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee left the remainder of the time at my disposal, and I would like to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not propose, as everybody understands——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman had eight minutes and yielded seven of it to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. I do not see how he has five minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk who keeps the tally at the desk as to time extended informs the Chair that a mistake was made in announcing the time, and that the gentleman from Michigan had five minutes instead of one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the "special duty" provided for in this act shall be levied upon all articles imported into the United States of a class or kind identical or comparable with a class or kind made or produced in the United States, or of a kind sold in competition with articles made or produced in the United States, to be ascertained, determined, and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think that this bill is on the whole very well drawn, although it may be possible that, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] stated, it is somewhat strong in some of its provisions and may need to be modified as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. In fact, I am entirely in accord with his amendment, which would simply express the idea that the committee had. Now, for the information of gentlemen upon the floor who have not had an opportunity to carefully study the bill, I would say that section 9, which prescribes the duty to be laid and which embraces the fundamental principles of the bill, refers back to section 1, which has just been read by the Clerk. Gentlemen will understand that the special duty which is to be imposed by this bill applies whether there is a duty now on the article or not, provided it comes under the definition of section 1, which we have just read.

Even if the article be one that comes in free of duty now, the special duty will be imposed if the article imported is sold in this country at less than the price, the fair market value in the home market, and comes in competition with American goods. This is, I think, as it should be, and I think it is quite clear, as the gentleman from North Carolina stated, that the present antidumping provisions contained in the Underwood bill can not be enforced. If this bill were not passed, we would be at the mercy of a country like Germany, and possibly a country like France, which have accumulated a large stock of certain goods which they were unable to sell during the war and which they now desire to get rid of at any price. If they can not sell them at one price, they will doubtless sell at another. Of course, this is particularly applicable in the case of dyes.

There was some discussion raised in the committee over the use of the word "comparable," which is found in section 5, and it was thought possible that it conferred too extensive powers in the direction of excluding goods which might be comparable with those produced in this country. I think that, taken in connection with the last clause of the first section, which provides that these goods shall be ascertained, determined, and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, there is no danger that this provision will be used in such a way as to work an injury to the country when it is simply proposed to sell some article not manufactured in this country for a low price. It is obviously to the interest of this country, where an article does not enter into competition with the things made here, that we should obtain it as cheaply as possible. It is not the intention, therefore, that this bill should operate as against tea, coffee, raw silk, and a long list of other articles which I might mention which are used by our manufacturers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is, of course, highly important that our manufacturers should receive their raw material, not furnished by this country or not products of this country, at as cheap a rate as possible. This bill will not in the least interfere with that.

The substance of the bill, I may say in closing, is embraced in section 9, which provides that where an article produced in foreign countries is sold in this country at a price less than the fair market value at home an additional duty shall be paid, amounting to the difference between the price at which it is sold and the fair market value at home.

Now, there was in the original bill a provision that where this addition was levied no other penalty should be prescribed. That part has been stricken out of the bill, it being thought by the committee that this provision, even when taken with the other provisions in the tariff act as it now stands, would not be too severe to prevent dumping, the effect of which, of course, would be to drive our producers out of the market, whether they were manufacturers or producers of other articles.

The purpose of this bill is the same as the present law, but the present law can not be enforced. It may seem too drastic, but we have found the present statute entirely insufficient. It will be observed, as we proceed with the bill, that provision is made whereby an examination may be made, if necessary, of the books of a foreign manufacturer, and in case permission is refused to exclude his goods from our markets. This provision is new but absolutely necessary if we would control "dumping." In the absence of such a provision it would often be impossible to ascertain whether the foreigner was selling below cost.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] may proceed for 10 minutes. He wanted to talk on the subject of sugar, and was allowed time under general debate, but he was crowded out by the yielding of more time to other gentlemen. I hope he will be given unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] may be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the honorable Representative from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] on Friday last had printed on page 213 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement purported to be a copy of an authorized statement recently issued by the Attorney General in relation to sugar. I desire to read a part of that statement, the essential part, so far as Congress is concerned, and the part I challenge:

A conference has been held this morning between representatives of the Sugar Equalization Board and the Department of Justice, in which the sugar situation was reviewed. The Department of Justice has no power nor facilities with which to control the purchase or distribution of sugar. The only governmental body having this power is the Sugar Equalization Board, and its control terminates on December 31. The Congress, although requested to do so, has failed to extend the life of the board.

This statement is not only confusing and misleading but it seems to me that it is unqualifiedly false, much as I regret to have to use these harsh characterizations. To prove my assertion I have in my hands a copy of the charter of the United States Sugar Equalization Board, and the sixth section of the charter says:

This corporation is not to have perpetual existence. Its existence is to commence on the 15th day of July, 1918, and is to cease on the 14th day of July, 1923, unless sooner dissolved in the manner provided by law.

The words "in the manner provided by law" means the manner provided by the Delaware corporation laws, as the corporation is a Delaware corporation. So that the Sugar Equalization Board, in accordance with its terms of incorporation, has existence until July 14, 1923, and Congress had no need to extend the life of the board, or could it do so without reincorporating it or superseding the laws of Delaware. Yet the Attorney General says that Congress, although requested to do so, has failed to extend the life of the board.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the charter of incorporation as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of his remarks the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. In connection with the charter, which the gentleman proposes to incorporate in the RECORD, will he be kind enough to cite the appropriation bill which continues the appropriation for the Sugar Equalization Board over December 31?

Mr. TINKHAM. There has never been an appropriation for the Sugar Equalization Board. There never has been, and it has never been contemplated or necessary. The President gave from his $100,000,000 war emergency fund $5,000,000 to the board for them to do business with, and they have made a profit in excess of $30,000,000 by their transactions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Following is the matter referred to:

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. The sole stockholder of this corporation is the President of the United States?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes. He not only is the sole stockholder, but directly controlled its entire policy, as the following authentic evidence will show. Last October a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate held a hearing and during the hearing a copy of the following letter was offered directed to the President of the United States by the Sugar Equalization Board. This may be found upon page 53 of the minutes of the hearing, and is as follows:

AUGUST 14, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Sugar Equalization Board is in receipt of a letter under date of July 29 from the Cuban commissioners, tendering to the American Government the Cuban sugar crop for 1920.

We deem it advisable that the Cuban commission should be advised at an early date as to whether our Government proposes to consider this tender. The authority of this board does not extend beyond the purchase and distribution of this year's sugar crop, and we venture to suggest the control of sugar for the coming year must now be determined.

I am inclosing herewith a memorandum setting forth the sugar situation as it exists and such information as we possess concerning the prospects for the coming year and other points for your consideration in advising this board as to the policy you desire to be pursued.

The officers of the board are prepared to furnish you with any further information that you may desire.

UNITED STATES SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD (INC.),
_____ _____, President.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

On page 57 there will be found a copy of the following communication, which was a letter urging the President again to authorize the purchase of the 1920 Cuban sugar crop:

SEPTEMBER 20, 1919.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring now to my letter to you of the 14th day of August inclosing the report from the board of directors of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), and also referring to you a letter from the representatives of the Cuban Government and producers of sugar, in reference to the Cuban crop of raw sugars for the year 1919–20, I desire to respectfully bring to your attention the fact that the time is fast approaching, if it has not arrived, when we will be unable to control the Cuban crop of sugar for the year 1919–20 unless action is taken at once.

I am informed that a considerable tonnage of Cuban sugars of the crop of 1919–20 has already been sold, and it seems entirely probable that the representatives of the Cuban sugar will withdraw their proposition unless some action is taken at once.

May I, therefore, respectfully ask an early determination of the policy which the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) is to pursue with reference to the matter referred to in my letter of the 14th day of August? I know the pressure you are under, and nothing but imperative necessity could make me add this matter to your burdens.

Very respectfully, GEORGE A. ZABRISKIE, President.

On page 55 there is a copy of the memorandum submitted to the President by the board at the time of the first communication, and is as follows:

Conditions are so abnormal and the prospect of securing a regular supply of sugar at a reasonable price for the people of the United States for the year 1920 is so uncertain that the equalization board concludes, from a commercial point of view, that its duty requires it to suggest to the President that, in reply to the communication from the representatives of Cuban producers, negotiations be entered into for the purpose of securing the sugar required for the necessities of the people of the United States for the year 1920 from Cuba under somewhat the same arrangements as the equalization board was able to make with the Cuban commissioners and producers and the refiners in the United States for the year ending December 31, 1919. This suggestion is made entirely from our consideration of the sugar situation from the standpoint of assuring the American people a regular supply at a reasonable price and, of course, is subject to the general policy of the Government as to the advisability of continuing control and regulation of food commodities.

Before making any comment to prove my assertions made at the beginning of my remarks, I want to read to you certain questions and answers found on page 47 of the same hearing.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes; I will yield to the honorable Representative from Louisiana.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state at this point, in justice to the President, that Prof. Taussig, also with the Sugar Equalization Board, filed a minority report?

Mr. TINKHAM. There are seven directors of the equalization board, and Prof. Taussig was one, and he dissented from the proposal to purchase the 1920 Cuban sugar crop.

Mr. MARTIN. That is true.

Mr. TINKHAM. Turning to page 47 of the minutes of the subcommittee hearing, I read the following:

Senator McNARY. Judge, on that point, what I want to develop is this: The President suggested to this Sugar Equalization Board that they should acquire this crop?

Mr. GLASGOW. Yes.

Senator McNARY. Did you have the legal authority to acquire the crop without any authorization from the President?

Mr. GLASGOW. I would not like to answer that. I can say that it would not have been done without that.

Senator McNARY. And would you have the authority to acquire that without action of the President?

Mr. GLASGOW. It would not be done, because, in the first place, the President is the entire stockholder of this concern.

I now want to return to the statement of the Attorney General and then summarize. He said that—

The Department of Justice has neither the power nor the facilities with which to control the purchase or distribution of sugar. The only governmental body having this power is the Sugar Equalization Board, and its control terminates on December 31. The Congress, although requested to do so, has failed to extend the life of the board.

Its control of the 1919 Cuban crop terminated December 31, but it had the power to obtain the 1920 Cuban crop with the assent of the President, as is indicated by the testimony which I have read. Therefore the statement of the Attorney General is not only misleading but false—false, because the Sugar Equalization Board had the right with the assent of the President to purchase, and misleading because the country from his statement would draw the conclusion that Congress was responsible for the situation that exists and not the President.

Had the President done as requested in the two communications received by him from the equalization board, then the price of sugar would have been stabilized and largely controlled in price, as the price of the Cuban crop sets the basic price for all sugar in the United States. There was all the law and facilities necessary to do this thing.

Mr. Chairman, upon the evidence that I have submitted, I feel justified in making my opening statement that the statement of the Attorney General in the particulars I have mentioned was misleading, confusing, and false.

The responsibility for not purchasing the 1920 Cuban crop, thus stabilizing and reducing the price of sugar, is clearly upon the President and not upon the Congress, as the Attorney General would lead the country to believe.

I want now to draw statistically a few conclusions which result from the President not doing as requested by the Sugar Equalization Board. When the first letter was sent to the President the average price of Cuban sugar was 6½ cents per pound.

The price of the same sugar now is about 8½ cents per pound, and is constantly rising. The American consumption of sugar is about 4,000,000 tons per annum, and the difference of 2 cents per pound amounts to $180,000,000, which must be paid by the American people over what might have been paid. As the price of Cuban sugar will undoubtedly increase perhaps from 8½ to 10½ or 12½ cents per pound, there will be an additional cost to the American people over what that cost might have been, if the advice of the equalization board had been followed by the President, of $360,000,000 or $540,000,000 for the next year.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I just came in. May I ask if the gentleman has quoted the letter from Mr. Zabriskie to the President?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have read two letters from Mr. Zabriskie to the President, one dated August 14 and the other September 20.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the gentleman will put in his remarks the memorandum submitted by Prof. Taussig to the President.

Mr. TINKHAM. I am pleased to submit that memorandum at the suggestion of the honorable Representative from Louisiana, but it in no way changes the responsibility of the President for not authorizing the purchase of the 1920 Cuban sugar crop in accordance with the recommendations of the Sugar Equalization Board or removes from him personal liability for the present situation in the American sugar market, both as to the price and scarcity of this necessary of life, and the responsibility of what the American sugar market will be for the next year rests alone upon him for his inaction.

Memorandum of Dr. F. W. Taussig submitted to the President:

MEMORANDUM.

I regret not to be able to reach the same conclusion as the other members of the Sugar Equalization Board. I believe that no negotiation should be entered in with the Cuban producers, and that the regulation and restriction of sugar prices should cease with the close of the present arrangement, December 31.

It is true that the evidence now available points to a shortage of sugar in 1920 and to a possibility of prices in that year as high as those of 1919, or even higher. But no certain conclusions can be reached about the future. Prices of sugar will be affected not only by the incoming supplies but by the general political and monetary conditions of the whole world. The general level of prices in the United States and in other countries may be lower than it is now. Consumption may be reduced by changes in general business conditions or by restrictive measures in importing countries. The present recommendation of the board is that the United States (through the board) should repeat a huge commercial venture, in the hope of protecting consumers and of incurring no loss, but with the clear possibility of having to assume a loss. The operation would involve a guaranty by the Government of extremely high profits to the Cuban sugar planters, and also a virtual guaranty of similar profits to our beet-sugar producers as well as to the planters of Louisiana, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. It would necessarily lead to contracts with the sugar refiners which would guarantee good profits to them also. No doubt in the absence of Government regulation all these producers might make profits higher still; but prediction as to the outcome one way or the other can not be made with any confidence. Business of this kind may be undertaken by the Government under stress of war, but should cease now that we are at peace.

Moreover, the regulation of the price of sugar can not, in my judgment, stand alone. The whole relation of government to industry in time of peace is involved. If the price of sugar is to be specifically controlled, so should that of bread, of meat, of clothing. In the main, we must look for a remedy to the natural development of production and to the return of the entire world to normal financial and economical conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the words "the value to countries other than the United States" wherever used in this act mean the value plus the cost, when not included in such value, of the package and the packing charges at which any merchandise or similar merchandise comparable therewith in value is freely offered for sale for exportation to countries other than the United States in the principal markets or markets of the country of exportation in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual or fair average wholesale quantities that the same kind or class provided for in this act is sold in the United States: Provided, That any import duties rebated or not paid by reason of the exportation of such merchandise from the country of production or sale to the country other than the United States shall be added to export price.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The word "conservation" has a wonderful sound, but when stripped of fancy and exposed for definition has more of applied than actual meaning.

"Conservation" should give way to the word "development." The land or mine has only potential value, requiring work, hard work, upon the part of the pioneer to make of actual value. The pioneer is there, willing and earnest to cultivate the soil. Conservation prevents the achievement, conserving the land, the opportunity, and the necessary work for some future man or condition to arise, while the pioneer is ready now.

Conservation means suspicion of the only man competent to reclaim the land. Encourage the man whose ambition is building the West. Repeal laws obstructive to his progress; his successor may be unwilling and unfitted to successfully carry on the all-important work. Give the pioneer your confidence and recognition.

The man who lives on beans, bacon, and canned goods on a mountainous desert, where a goat would starve, giving his lifetime to develop barren areas where an eastern man would die of homesickness, should be encouraged. You hear doubt from men who are more familiar with cut glass and marble bathtubs, whose greatest hardship is the nerve-racking experience of riding a street car, seeking the "bubble reputation" as protectors of eminent domain from looters, existent only in the overanxious imagination of men who know exactly nothing of the West and western needs. Conservation means keeping as it is, which would be a state of utter worthlessness to all humankind. Development means bringing into useful purpose and production large areas of desert. You must encourage development by granting title when a reasonable amount of annual work is expended upon vacant Government land. There is no way to make that soil produce except by privation and toil. The people of Nevada are afflicted to the limit with bureau regulations, scores of Government inspectors, collectors, and dictators from Washington traveling through our State imposing impractical methods at our expense, while Nevada seeks only the right to conduct her own affairs, with your approval of the integrity of her legislature to enact laws, encouraging development of worthless lands, and so they will remain worthless, except for one thing—work.

You gentlemen mean to be fair. It is only your lack of information which causes mistrust against the State. Your most progressive laws come from the West. Decide upon a different western policy, instead of creating and trusting bureaus, place your faith in men of the West whose interest and honor are at stake, desiring to best build their beloved section of our country. Their governor and legislators deserve your complete trust.

Some months ago this Congress passed a measure the object of which was to encourage development of water upon arid Nevada lands. The legislation was experimental, but has proven a great stimulus to entries upon barren lands; much money will be expended to demonstrate an underground flow of water. That legislation aids progress in Nevada, reflecting credit upon your judgment.

Let us draw a homely example of the man whom you all know, who looked forward to the twenty-first year of his life as the period when he would be his own boss and could act without parental interference, always in his mind the idea of doing right with others. A boy of 21 is entitled to live his own life; the need is recognition of his maturity. Nevada has been 21 years old since 1885, eager for her opportunity. Held back by laws made by men who never saw the State; laws made by other men who rode across that which was to them, from a Pullman car, a forbidding desert, coming back to their eastern homes of culture convinced that what they saw must remain as it is.

Conservation is defined as "the act of conserving" or "keeping as it is," therefore your law of conservation means prevention of work necessary to reclaim the desert.

Nevada, being of age, demands that she be given the state of depending upon herself. Knowing as he does the peculiar needs of our desert country, the pioneer is the logical expert upon whom you must rely for light upon the best plan of operation. Remove collectors, experts, and instructors; depend upon the integrity of our citizens to build a commonwealth of which all will be proud, builded upon the foundation of industry and reason.

Nevada, as a State, was born during the agony of civil war, when her production of gold and silver bullion as a horn of plenty poured at Lincoln's feet that all men may be free. If wrong to dominate an individual, it is wholesale wrong to refuse full freedom to a State whose citizens demand recognition of their indomitable Americanism and self-reliance.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the term "cost of production" wherever used in this act means the cost of labor and material of the merchandise exported to the United States at the time of production plus the actual general expenses and a profit which is usually and ordinarily added to the cost of labor, material, packing charges, and general expenses by manufacturers in the country of production of merchandise similar in material and production or manufacture.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan what the term "general expenses" covers in line 11 of this section? Has that been defined in any previous legislation?

Mr. FORDNEY. There was a provision in the bill that was stricken out by the committee to provide salaries for men employed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the investigation of importations at lower prices than those provided for. It was thought wise by the committee to strike that out, because it fixed salaries and per diem expenses, and to leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix those items under the general law. These general expenses might cover a great many things, clerks and office work, and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Under the phraseology in section 6 salaries can be computed as general expenses, can they not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Such salaries as under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is permitted to pay.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is not the gentleman from Michigan referring to the general expenses as a part of the expense of the Government, whereas the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts has to do with the expenses of the manufacturer?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I did not understand that. That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. WALSH. What does the term "general expenses by the manufacturer" cover?

Mr. FORDNEY. First of all, the manner of determining the cost of production would be the labor cost, the general expenses, overhead, taxes, depreciation, packing, packing boxes, and all other costs that go to make up the total cost of the article when ready for export. That must be determined by finding the actual cost of the article, where the price can not be obtained, in the country where it is made. We must get the cost of production that would cover any expenses that went in to make up the total cost of production.

Mr. WALSH (reading from the bill)—

plus the actual general expenses and a profit which is usually and ordinarily added to the cost of labor, material, packing charges, and general expenses by manufacturers in the country of production of merchandise similar in material and production or manufacture.

That would include depreciation, salary, overhead expenses, taxes, insurance——

Mr. FORDNEY. Prorated; yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That whenever merchandise, whether dutiable or free, is exported to the United States of the class or kind provided for in this act, and the sales price is less than the foreign home value, or in the absence of such value is less than the value to countries other than the United States, or in the absence of such value is less than the cost of production, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the duties on imported merchandise prescribed by law, a special duty in an amount equal to the difference between the sales price and the foreign home value or the value to countries other than the United States or the cost of production, as the case may be.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 23, at the end of the line add the following: "This section shall not apply to any article imported the like of which is not produced in substantial quantities in the United States, the same to be ascertained, determined, and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That if any person importing merchandise into the United States shall fail, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, or an appraiser, or person acting as such, or a collector of customs, as the case may be, to secure permission for a duly accredited officer of the United States to inspect any or all books, records, accounts, documents, or other papers pertaining to the value or classification of such merchandise, of the person selling, shipping, or consigning the merchandise to the United States, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall, while such failure or refusal continues, prohibit future importations into the United States of merchandise from such seller, shipper, or consignor by any importer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman if the authority conferred by the bill would authorize an agent of the Treasury Department to go into a factory or shop of a manufacturer in a foreign country and investigate the books.

Mr. FORDNEY. The bill gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to make such a request by the proper representative. If the foreigner refuses it is obligatory on the Secretary to forbid the importation of those goods until such consent is given.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman assume that other countries might adopt similar measures?

Mr. FORDNEY. They do it now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think that American business men and manufacturers would resent the intrusion and inspection of their business affairs by an agent of a foreign government?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; they submit to it. If I had the time, I could give illustrations where Canada has sent agents to this country and demanded the right to examine the manufacturer's books, and on failure to permit that examination the goods which were shipped to Canada were ordered out of Canada.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I rather anticipate if that situation arises you will hear considerable complaint from American business men.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I think the practice carried on by the Government in Canada to-day in that respect against our people who wish to dump on Canada goods at a less price than they are sold for here has been tested in many instances and works satisfactorily and is accepted by our people.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That if any person engaged in the importation of merchandise into the United States or engaged in dealing in such imported merchandise shall fail or refuse to submit for inspection of a duly accredited investigating officer of the United States upon request so to do from the collector or the appraiser, or the person acting as such, or any other officer of the United States customs duly authorized by law, any or all of his books or records, accounts, documents, or other papers pertaining to the value or classification of any such imported merchandise, then the Secretary of the Treasury, while such failure or refusal continues, shall prohibit the future importations of any merchandise into the United States by or for the persons so refusing.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman how many junketing trips will this afford agents to foreign countries?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just as many as the foreigner attempts to impose upon our people the sale of goods at a less price than he sells them at home for the purpose of destroying the industry in the United States. Just that many times we can look for a representative from our Government to go abroad.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be hundreds of merchants shipping goods to this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will our Secretary wait until he has reason to believe that they are imposing on this country, or will he annually send men abroad to examine the books and accounts of these manufacturers?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; our board of appraisers are looked upon as the only authority to notify the Secretary of the Treasury that such action has been taken. Upon a proper showing the Secretary of the Treasury will send an agent abroad to examine the books and hold up the goods until the information is obtained.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman does know that with very little excuse sometimes representatives are sent across the water to look after this or that on behalf of this Government.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, I might call attention to the fact that our Employment Service here spent $6,000 sending two men across apparently to look after the reemployment of our men even before they got out of the Army. Such things appear to me to be ridiculous.

Mr. FORDNEY. They do to me also. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Should there not be some limitation, at least, placed upon these annual, semiannual, or monthly junketing trips across the water?

Mr. FORDNEY. The bill does place a limitation by providing that information must be furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury before such investigation is made through his office by the Board of Appraisers.

Mr. BLANTON. The Secretary of the Treasury, I presume, would send fewer than any other department.

Mr. FORDNEY. I assume that he would not send anybody for the purpose of a junketing trip.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can not deny that there have been trips across the water that smacked of junketing.

Mr. FORDNEY. Not by men sent by the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman may apply that to the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. I could refer to instances closer home.

Mr. KITCHIN. Perhaps the gentleman refers to the Shipping Board investigation.

Mr. BLANTON. And the investigation of the expenditures in the War Department.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, who moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on that motion I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10918, the antidumping bill, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MOORE of Virginia, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. FLOOD, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WATSON of Virginia, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. THOMPSON, for the month of December (at the request of Mr. MURPHY), on account of serious illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill to Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. HERSEY, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a brief letter addressed to Dr. Couden, our esteemed Chaplain, complimentary of his distinguished services in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

THE CIVIC EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MARYLAND, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
December 4, 1919.

Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In order to obtain an expression of opinion from members of the Civic Educational Association of Maryland regarding the proposed treaty of peace with Germany, and especially the league of nations, a ballot vote was taken of the members. The result of this vote is sent to you in the hope that it may be of value to you in expressing the views on a most important public matter of a nonpartisan organization representative of the best public opinion in the State. The result of the vote showed that the sentiment in favor of a league of nations of some sort is unanimous. The members favor the adherence of the United States to article 10 of the covenant in the proportion of four to one. The members are opposed to the reservations adopted by a majority of the Senate requiring acceptance by the other powers in the proportion of eight to one. The members are in favor of the adoption of a treaty without reservations requiring acceptance by the other powers in the proportion of nine to one.

Realizing fully that this association represents a small number of citizens and is not of great influence in the State, we nevertheless dare to hope that in expressing our views they may be taken by you as entitled to consideration on the grounds that they are the unbiased opinion of an association whose sole object is the advancement of the welfare of the people of this State.

Respectfully, yours, GEORGE S. YOST, Secretary.

OIL SITUATION IN MEXICO.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a communication affecting the oil situation in Mexico, signed by a number of oil companies, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, December 8, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Within the last 30 days the Mexican Government, employing its armed soldiers, has stopped American-owned companies from drilling oil wells in Mexico and has locked up their tools under Government seal. The companies are thus deprived of the use and enjoyment of their own properties, and there exists no justification for these high-handed acts.

All of the facts have been communicated to the State Department at Washington. The statements of the companies show in detail the physical acts of confiscation that have occurred. The companies, being in no position to meet force with force, are at the end of their row.

The avowed purpose of the Mexican Government is to nationalize petroleum, and this is its latest move to that end. Nationalization means confiscation in this instance. There is no pretense of compensation, just or otherwise, and there is also lacking the element of national necessity. The scheme was first voiced in article 27 of the Queretaro constitution, effective May 1, 1917, declaring in terms that petroleum belongs to the nation. Then followed various executive decrees, issued in 1918 and ratified by Congress in December of that year, designed to carry the constitutional provision into effect and make it retroactive. The American-owned companies had acquired their properties, consisting of lands in fee and oil leases executed by landowners, prior to the adoption of this constitution and at a time when by express statute landowners owned also any petroleum contained in or found upon the land. So when Carranza undertook to carry out his program in 1918 the State Department at Washington took cognizance and said in effect that such confiscation of vested rights would not be permitted as against citizens of the United States. The Mexican officials then undertook to accomplish their purpose of indirection. The executive submitted to the Mexican Congress an elaborate petroleum bill similar to the decrees, which bill is still pending. Knowing that oil wells do not last forever, the authorities adopted the policy, or retained the previously adopted policy—theretofore a mere police regulation—of requiring permits to be obtained before oil wells are drilled, and as a condition annexed to the permits they required the companies to expressly agree in writing to conform to the petroleum law when enacted by Congress. The companies refused to submit to this condition. Some of them offered to stipulate as demanded, with a proviso that the law should not take away any of their vested rights, but that was unsatisfactory to the authorities, and the permits were canceled. Thereupon, as and when the companies felt that the necessities of their business required it, they proceeded to drill without permits. It is this drilling by the companies on their own properties that has been stopped. One large well was brought in without a permit. Its operation is prevented by force.

The companies recognize the property in ordinary circumstances of the Government requiring them to obtain drilling permits. But that practice is warranted only as a police regulation. Here the purpose was ulterior. The permits were issued, but with them was coupled an impossible condition. The fact of issuance shows that all police requirements had been met, and the condition stands out as conclusive proof of the ulterior purpose. It meant that if the petroleum law when enacted should follow the decrees the companies would have surrendered their titles to the Government. True, the petroleum law might give the companies a preference right to prospect for and produce oil in their confiscated properties, but in order to do this, according to the pending bill, they would have to pay royalties to the Government and take a mere mining license subject to the will and future regulations of the Government. That is all they would get in exchange for the rights and titles which they already had bought and paid for, and which they had acquired not from the Government through concession or otherwise but from private landowners whose title to the petroleum was unquestioned. If the Mexican Government could bring about this situation and enforce either the one consequence or the other it could confiscate outright; there is no difference. The case is the same as if a city should covet a lot within its boundaries and when the owner sought a building permit impose the condition that it receive a quitclaim deed for the property. Wrongs which can not be accomplished directly may not be accomplished indirectly.

A vital fact to keep in mind is that these proceedings have occurred under the constitution, which says that petroleum belongs to the nation. It says more, namely, that the nation's ownership is inalienable and imprescriptible. Hence no decree or statute could give more than a temporary license, once the constitution is applied and upheld. And foreign companies could not obtain even that much; they are expressly outlawed by the same constitution. The situation therefore is that the companies are forcibly prevented from taking oil from their properties, and the Government is asserting simultaneously that the oil belongs to the nation—inalienably and imprescriptibly.

The present victims are the producers of one of the most useful products in the world. The oil industry has its place in the front rank of those that are essential. Furthermore, the companies here affected are not of any particular group. They are owned by American stockholders, thousands in number, including men, women, and children. Their operations in Mexico have been conducted by pioneers of the kind that all Americans admire. Many of these pioneers have been murdered while peacefully pursuing their lawful vocations in these oil fields. This part of the price that has been paid should give the case importance even in the eyes of those who would not fight in the defense of mere property rights. But it is not that element of the case that the companies invoke, for they believe that every American who is worthy of deliverance from Bolshevism considers life and liberty themselves of little value except for the guaranties of civilization that go with them, conspicuous among which is the right to acquire and enjoy property as the reward for human effort.

The companies, or many of them, are exporting oil from Mexico and importing the greater portion to the United States, where it is much needed at the present time. They have made large expenditures and have incurred large contractual obligations in anticipation of the development and production of these Mexican properties. Recently their wells in parts of the southern Mexico field have failed very rapidly, going to salt water. The new wells were necessary to meet this contingency. As their old wells cease to produce their business comes to an end. One large company already has reached the point where it no longer has any of this crude for export to the United States or elsewhere. Stress of this kind can not be endured indefinitely.

A claim for damages would be worthless. There could be no ascertainment of the real damages, and the collection would be no less a problem.

The companies appeal to Congress, as they are appealing to the State Department. They ask for protection.

It may not be inappropriate, in conclusion, to advert further but briefly to certain aspects of the matter that extend beyond the commercial interests of the companies. Shipments of oil from Mexico to the United States are now at least 60,000,000 barrels per annum. While some of this goes into light products, a very large part of it is used as fuel. It goes to supply our Navy, the Shipping Board, the Railroad Administration, and hundreds of industries which formerly used coal. These industries can not get coal at this time, and if they are unable to get oil they must shut down. A comparatively small percentage of crude oil produced in this country goes into fuel oil or is suitable for that purpose. If this Mexican supply is cut off or diminished, as certainly will be the case if the companies are not allowed to drill new wells as old wells fail, it will be keenly felt in the United States; adequate supplies of fuel oil will not be available at any price. Therefore if it should fail to protect its citizens abroad our Government by the same failure would bring about unwarranted injury to itself and its citizens at home.

MINISTER TO FINLAND.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2690) authorizing the appointment of a minister to Finland, reported it with amendments.

EXTENSION OF PASSPORT CONTROL.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and which is reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Relations, may be now considered. It is a very brief measure. It simply makes a certain appropriation available at this time, and it ought to be passed at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 131) making immediately available the appropriation for the expenses of regulating further the entry of aliens into the United States was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That so much of the sum of $600,000 appropriated by section 4 of the act of October 29, 1919, entitled "An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States," as may be necessary is hereby made immediately available for expenses of regulating entry into the United States, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved May 22, 1918.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FRANCE. I was unable to hear the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I will state to the Senator from Maryland what it is. We passed a bill carrying an appropriation of $600,000 for the purpose of regulating the entry of aliens, and it ought to be made available at once. The other appropriation is exhausted, and this one ought to be available at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the appropriation of $2,450,000 carried in the sundry civil bill for the enforcement of the immigration laws, and so forth, is exhausted?

Mr. LODGE. This joint resolution has nothing to do with that appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This amount of $2,450,000 is for the enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States—the contract-labor law, and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. This is not for the Bureau of Immigration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is for the Immigration Service, Department of Labor.

Mr. LODGE. This is not for the Immigration Service, Department of Labor. This is a measure in regard to the issuance of passports by the Department of State. It has nothing to do with that appropriation. It has already been made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The act that carries the $600,000 is entitled "An act to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States."

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but it does not come under the Bureau of Immigration. It has nothing to do with that. It is a bill that was passed by both Houses and became a law in October last, and it carries an appropriation of $600,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; I have the act here.

Mr. LODGE. The appropriation has been made. Owing to the delay in the proclamation of peace, it has become essential to the department to have some of the money available now. This merely makes an existing appropriation available.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, we have extended the passport law in regard to the admission of foreigners into this country. The passport law was only to remain in force during the war, but we have lately passed in the Senate a bill continuing it.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. NELSON. And this fund is to be used for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. It is the only method we have of keeping out certain undesirable aliens.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have copies of all these acts here, but I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that we have an abundance of money to enforce the laws that we have. The difficulty seems to be that the administration will not enforce the laws that we put upon the statute books. I am not going to interfere with the passage of the Senator's joint resolution. I am just calling attention to the situation.

Mr. LODGE. I think, however, that the Senator misunderstood it. When that appropriation was made, this law was not in existence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; this law was.

Mr. LODGE. No; it was not in existence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The sundry civil bill was approved July 19, 1919, and the $600,000——

Mr. LODGE. And the bill carrying this appropriation was approved October 29, 1919.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the original act was passed in 1918.

Mr. LODGE. No, no; this special act was approved October 29, 1919.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Massachusetts is in error, I think. There was an act passed, as the Senator states, during the war.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly there was. I know that.

Mr. KING. And we continued that in force for another year.

Mr. LODGE. We continued that act, and in order to carry it out we appropriated $600,000. All that this joint resolution proposes is to make available now that money which they need for the enforcement of that particular act.

Mr. KING. I understand; but the Senator, I think, was in error in stating that this was a new statute, or in substance he stated that.

Mr. LODGE. It is a new statute, approved the 29th of October, 1919.

Mr. KING. It is a continuation of an existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not going to interfere with the passage of the Senator's joint resolution; but I want to call attention to the fact that in the sundry civil bill of 1919 we appropriated $2,450,000 for the enforcement of the immigration laws that can be used for the deportation of aliens, and so forth, and that in the deficiency act of November 4, 1919, we appropriated $200,000 more for the Department of Justice to use in the deportation of aliens, and there was also available for the Department of Labor an additional amount of $263,000 for the deportation of aliens.

Mr. LODGE. Now, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will just wait a minute, I shall be glad to have $600,000 made available for the use of the Department of State, but I hope that department will proceed a little bit more energetically and a little bit more actively than the Department of Labor has proceeded under the appropriations that we have made for it.

Mr. LODGE. So do I.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad to make the money available for the State Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment, if the Senator pleases. This joint resolution has nothing whatever to do with deportation. It relates solely to the entry of aliens. It is to prevent the entry of certain aliens by means of the passport system. That is all it proposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope they will enforce that act with that money better and more promptly than the Department of Labor has done.

Mr. LODGE. So do I. That is the reason why they are asking that the money be made available, so that they may enforce it.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Washington will join with me in having enacted into law a bill which I had the honor to introduce a few days ago, which takes away from the Department of Labor the enforcement of the deportation statute and places it under the head of some other department of the Government, because I agree with the Senator that the Department of Labor has been derelict in its duty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; if the Senator can find a department that will assure us that it will act more promptly, I will heartily support the measure.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 253, submitted by Mr. FERNALD on the 9th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate No. 97, agreed to July 1, 1919, authorizing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, to send for persons, books, and papers, and to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, amended to empower said committee to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; the expenses of travel incident to the sessions of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3509) granting the consent of Congress to Marion County, State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across the Pearl River, in Marion County, State of Mississippi; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3510) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Amory, Miss., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3511) granting a pension to Charles M. Woodworth; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 3512) granting a pension to Flora A. Winchester (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO RAILROAD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. STANLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. KNOX. I present and ask to have read a resolution on a purely formal matter, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. After it has been read, I will explain its purpose in a few words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended by inserting in Rule XXXIV, paragraph 2, line 3, after the word "restaurant," the following: "and the Senate Office Building," so that the rules as amended will comply with the provisions of Senate resolution 291, adopted by the Senate on February 17, 1909.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the explanation of the resolution is this:

On February 17, 1909—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 43, part 3, Sixtieth Congress, second session, RECORD page 2564—the Senate passed the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Cullom:

Resolved, That on and after the 4th day of March, 1909, the jurisdiction and functions of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, hitherto exercised in connection with the Senate wing of the Capitol, be, and the same are hereby, extended to cover in like manner jurisdiction over the Senate Office Building; and on and after the 4th day of March, 1909, said committee is hereby authorized and directed to proceed with the assignment of rooms in the Senate Office Building for the use of Senators.

Ever since the passage of that resolution the Senate Committee on Rules has exercised the jurisdiction provided for in the resolution; but the rules themselves have never been amended in order to make them comply with the resolution, and that is the purpose of the resolution that I have just offered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, the resolution does not extend the jurisdiction of the committee or increase its power over the assignment of rooms?

Mr. KNOX. Not at all. The jurisdiction of the committee was extended to the Senate Office Building by the resolution I have just read, passed in 1909, and has been exercised ever since. This is only to amend the rules of the Senate to comply with the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is to be understood as a notice of intention to amend the rules, is it?

Mr KNOX. I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration, if that is proper under the rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think we had better comply with the rule with reference to giving notice of proposed amendments to the rules.

Mr. KNOX. Very well. Let it be considered, then, as a notice of a proposed amendment of the rules, and I will formally submit the resolution to-morrow.

LAND IN WATERVILLE, ME.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3187) to dispose of a certain strip of public land in Waterville, Me. There is a little piece of land in Waterville on the post-office lot. The department has drawn a bill permitting the sale or lease of the land, and I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to the owner of the abutting land, for cash, the strip of land fronting 10 feet on the southeasterly side of Elm Street and extending, of that width, southeasterly along the southwesterly side of the Federal building site in Waterville, Me., a distance of 122 feet 4¾ inches, more or less, at a price not less than the pro rata square-foot cost of the land paid by the United States, which strip is not needed by the Government; to convey said land to the purchaser by the usual quit-claim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt. Or the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, grant said owner an easement in perpetuity in said strip of land for driveway purposes, charging therefor such sum as the Secretary of the Treasury deems just and reasonable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD.

Mr. MCNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Lodge	Shields
Ball	Gay	McCormick	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hale	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Harding	McLean	Spencer
Borah	Harrison	McNary	Stanley
Brandegee	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Sterling
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Thomas
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Trammell
Culberson	Kenyon	Phipps	Underwood
Cummins	Keyes	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dial	King	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Kirby	Sheppard	Wolcott
Fernald	La Follette	Sherman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, there is another bill——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill can not be discussed. The motion has to be put.

Mr. STERLING. I simply wanted to make a statement. I do not want to discuss the bill. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the reason why I do not move a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. KING. I suggest to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that we proceed with the motion of the Senator from Oregon. I agree with the Senator that the sedition bill which has been under consideration ought to be taken up, but we can take that up when we get the other out of the road.

Mr. STERLING. I wanted to speak about the urgent need of the passage of that bill, realizing, too, that the sugar bill, to which the Senator from Oregon has called attention and the consideration of which he has moved, is an important measure. I had thought at first that I would move a substitute, but I shall not do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be done. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284.

Mr. GAY. On the motion of the Senator from Oregon, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 3, after the word "authorized," to strike out the words "and directed"; on page 2, line 1, after the word "securing," at the end of the line, to insert a comma and the words "if found necessary for the public good"; on line 3, after the word "sugar," to strike out the word "for," and insert the words "at a fair and reasonable price to"; on line 5, after the word "States," to strike out the words "substantially similar to those employed by the corporation for the year ending December 31, 1919"; and on line 14, after the numerals "1917," to insert a colon and the following proviso: "And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall expire as to the domestic product September 30, 1920," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to continue during the year ending December 31, 1920, the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, and to vote or use the stock in such corporation held by him for the benefit of the United States, or otherwise exercise his control over the corporation and its directors, in such a manner as to authorize and require them to adopt and carry out until December 31, 1920, plans and methods of securing, if found necessary for the public good, an adequate supply at a reasonable price and an equitable distribution of sugar at a fair and reasonable price to the people of the United States: Provided, That after the passage of this act neither the President nor the corporation shall have or exercise, either directly or indirectly, with respect to raw or refined sugar, sirups, or molasses, any of the powers conferred upon the President by section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall expire as to the domestic product September 30, 1920.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall speak but briefly to the measure, in the hope that some action may be taken upon it by the Senate during the morning hour.

I think it is unnecessary for me to say that the sugar situation is critical and cruel and must be corrected. Senators will observe that this proposed legislation simply authorizes the United States Sugar Equalization Board to acquire raw sugars. It does not contain a license provision, such as is to be found in the Lever Act, and which was thought by some to be objectionable. It was the judgment of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that the license feature was not necessary to correct conditions that now obtain with respect to the sugar shortage.

Mr. President, I think it might be the part of wisdom for me briefly to refer to legislation that Congress has passed concerning this subject before proceeding to discuss other features of the pending bill.

It will be recalled that in the summer of 1917 Congress passed what was known as the food-control bill, or more generally known as the Lever bill. That measure authorized, among other things, the control of food products and the licensing of those engaged in the manufacture or sale of commodities or products.

Shortly after the enactment of the bill the President of the United States appointed Mr. Herbert C. Hoover administrator to carry into execution the terms and provisions of the measure.

During July, 1917, it appeared to the Food Administrator that there was a shortage of sugar. Attention to that condition was called to the President by Mr. Hoover.

In the latter part of July, 1918, the President, after receiving this information, promulgated an order creating the United States Sugar Equalization Board, composed of eight representative citizens of the country. In order presumably to protect themselves from personal liability, this board did not act under the promulgation order, but incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware. The capital stock was $5,000,000, furnished out of the President's emergency fund. The President was the sole stockholder. He elected the directorate. There is a provision in the charter that the stockholders could remove the directors at any time.

Following the incorporation under the laws of the State of Delaware, the President, as the sole stockholder of the corporation, directed the Sugar Equalization Board, then acting as a corporation, to acquire raw sugar. I want the Senate to keep in mind that the board was not acting in a legislative capacity, but in a corporate capacity.

In obedience to the order of the President the Food Administration entered into a voluntary agreement with the cane-sugar producers of Louisiana and the beet-sugar producers in the West whereby these raw sugars for the year 1919 were acquired on terms to be subsequently fixed by the Food Administrator. Later on, in compliance with this contract, the cane-sugar growers of Louisiana and the beet-sugar growers of the West, particularly in the States of California, Utah, Idaho, and Colorado, agreed to sell the refined sugar f. o. b. at 9 cents a pound.

The Sugar Equalization Board then entered the Cuban market, where cane sugar is produced and which is the great reservoir from which we obtain large quantities of our sugar. This unrefined sugar was purchased at 5.5 cents a pound, or $5.50 per hundred pounds. Agreement was made with the refiners that they should refine the sugar for $1.54 per hundred pounds. The duty was $1 per hundred pounds from Cuba. The freight was approximately 38½ cents per hundred pounds, and 38 cents per hundred pounds were retained by the board to defray the cost of administration of the law.

Agreement was made with the refiners that they would sell the refined granulated sugar at 9 cents. It was also determined by an order of the United States Sugar Equalization Board that the brokers should receive about one-fourth of 1 cent per pound for handling this product and the retailers should receive 1 cent per pound, or figures of approximately that amount, which brought the price of the refined sugar to the consumer at practically 10 cents a pound throughout the country.

This scheme worked very well. There was a plenitude of sugar last fall and the spring just behind us, and the consumers were getting a normal supply at a reasonable rate. For some reason unknown to the committee the Sugar Equalization Board in January of this year canceled this order which fixed the price to the consumer at practically 10 cents—that is, they removed the charge that the broker might exact from the retailer and the retailer from the public, leaving, however, the charge to the refiner of 9 cents per pound less 38 cents per hundred pounds retained by the board.

Some time later and during the spring of the present year it was discovered that there was a slowing up in the flow of sugar to the consumer. In July of the present year Mr. George A. Zabriskie, who is president of the Sugar Equalization Board, first noticed a visible shortage. In the summer of 1919, as I say, the shortage was observed by the board and an effort was made to correct the condition. There was plenty of available raw sugar, but it was found that the marine strike along the harbor of the city of New York had prevented shipment of raw sugar from Cuba to the refiners located in the cities of New York and Philadelphia. This strike condition existed for about 30 days. Following that and along in the early part of September the normal flow of sugar from Cuba to the United States was established. The flow of sugar from Cuba, which is about 80,000 tons a month, was restored, but the shortage still continued.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. GAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if it is not a fact that there was a great deal of sugar held up in the ports throughout this country, particularly New York, at the time of the longshoremen's strike? Does he know how much sugar was tied up at that time, and is it not his opinion that that affected the shortage very much?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I stated a moment ago that when the shortage became visible in July one of the contributing causes was the marine strike in the State of New York, which prevented the flow of sugar from Cuba, and there may have been some stored in the warehouses. The refiners were busy and refined promptly all the sugar that was brought to them, their capacity being about 80,000 tons a month. That is only one of the contributing causes to the shortage; but, in my opinion, the real cause was a psychological one and that cause is this: It was known generally, or at least becoming known, that we had not acquired the 1920 Cuban crop and that without the Cuban crop there was certain to be a shortage. I think we all know as an economic proposition that an anticipated shortage is an actual shortage. It caused hoarding and storing up in bins——

Mr. POMERENE. And increased prices.

Mr. McNARY. And consequently an increase in price, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

At this juncture the Sugar Equalization Board notified the President of the true and yet unhappy condition. At this point I wish to state that while this is perhaps a short digression, yet it fits within the brief statement I wish to make. Attention to the shortage was not called to Congress, but was called to the President by the Sugar Equalization Board, and I have here a statement clipped from the Washington Evening Star of October 31 of the present year, which gives color to many statements that have been made, including one from the Attorney General. It is a misstatement, perhaps not intentional, but so in fact. I read:

> Responsibility for the present condition, as well as for that which is expected to arise with the going out of existence of the Sugar Equalization Board, is placed by these men directly with Congress. Failure of that body to authorize the Sugar Equalization Board to buy the Cuban raw sugar crop when such authorization was asked last June, and refusal thus far to provide for continuance of the board, these men declare, are directly and solely responsible for the present condition, and will be the cause of the condition expected to arise after January 1.

That is a statement which I am informed has been reiterated by the Attorney General. No request was ever made to Congress for legislation. Indeed no legislation was necessary.

It was not until some time in the month of September of the present year that the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] directed the attention of this body to the sugar shortage and the possibility of exorbitant prices that would be charged to consumers during the present winter and the spring to come.

The Sugar Equalization Board met and passed resolutions which was transmitted to the President. This action of the board was taken some time in August of the present year and was a response to a letter received from the accredited representatives of the Cuban sugar growers of Cuba. As part of my remarks, I should be obliged if the Secretary would read at this time the communication to which I have just referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GEORGE A. ZABRISKIE,
President Equalization Board,
112 Wall Street, New York City.

DEAR SIR: In pursuance of the informal discussions conducted between the subscribers, speaking by authority for the Cuban Government, the members of the equalization board, as the purchasers and distributors of Cuba's sugar crop for the existing year, we deem it expedient to submit for your information, and as far as you may determine, for your action in continuing the control and disposition of Cuba's crop of sugar for the ensuing year 1920.

In presenting our suggestions, while acting directly for the Cuban sugar producer, we accept the grave responsibility of speaking scarcely less for the American consumer, and for that vast army of foreign consumers whose needs are of such concern to the American Government.

Fortunately for every interest involved the great bulk of sugar required by importing countries is provided by the island of Cuba—but she takes no note of this "coin of vantage"—on the other hand, the island Republic, its hacendados and farmers, and manufacturers of sugar tender through its own Government, providing it meets with the consent and cooperation of the American Government, the entire wealth of her production under such terms as may be agreed upon by the contracting parties at a price moderate, but compensating to the producer and well within the economic reach of the consumer.

This is the fundamental basis upon which our tender is made.

If accepted through the continued life and active participation of your respected board, or similar body, the whole question would be greatly simplified. If, on the contrary, the opportunity to serve, not the American people alone but the universal welfare, is for any reason, technical or otherwise, not availed of through one medium or another, there is not a community anywhere in America, in Europe, or Asia that will not feel the consequences of our failure to provide a stable price for this most necessary article of human consumption.

Cuba approaches this question with full recognition of her relations to the American people and their Government and in the spirit of comity and desire for a complete understanding.

We await with unflagging interest your reply, the subject of which we are assured is to you, as it is to us, the most momentous in the world's economy of to-day.

With assurances of great respect,
Faithfully, yours,
R. B. HAWLEY.
MANUEL RIONDA.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the letter just read at the desk was received by Mr. Zabriskie, the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, on the 29th day of July. Without great delay, on the 14th of August, 1919, the letter was transmitted to the President, and with that, as a companion, was a memorandum prepared by seven of the eight members of the equalization board advising the President of the propriety and advisability of buying the Cuban sugar crop. I should like to have this memorandum in the RECORD, though I shall not read it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GAY. I think it ought to be read. I think we are entitled to know what it is.

Mr. McNARY. Then I recall it. I do not care to take the time which would be required to read it. I will simply repeat, Mr. President, that seven of the members of the board out of the eight advised the President to acquire the Cuban sugar crop, and set forth very substantial reasons for that advice. If anyone desires to follow up that statement to see if my remarks are confirmed I refer him to the sugar-shortage hearings, which were had before the subcommittee of the Senate pursuant to Senate resolution 197.

The letter and memorandum of the 14th of August reached the President, and its receipt was acknowledged by him two days later, on August 16.

Now, in fairness to the board and to the statement made by the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] a few days ago, I will say that it is true that Dr. Taussig, a scholarly gentleman, filed a minority report, wherein he stated that he thought the supply of sugar from Cuba would answer the demands of the public if the law of supply and demand were permitted to take its usual course. Unfortunately, in my opinion, the President followed the advice of Dr. Taussig as against the advice of the board, and no action was taken by the President.

Again, on the 20th day of September, more than five weeks later, Mr. Zabriskie, president of the Sugar Equalization Board, sent a letter to the President, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 20, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring now to my letter to you of the 14th day of August inclosing the report from the board of directors of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), and also referring to you a letter from the representatives of the Cuban Government and producers of sugar, in reference to the Cuban crop of raw sugars for the year 1919–20, I desire to respectfully bring to your attention the fact that the time is fast approaching, if it has not arrived, when we will be unable to control the Cuban crop of sugar for the year 1919–20 unless action is taken at once.

I am informed that a considerable tonnage of Cuban sugars of the crop of 1919–20 has already been sold, and it seems entirely probable that the representatives of the Cuban sugar will withdraw their proposition unless some action is taken at once.

May I, therefore, respectfully ask an early determination of the policy which the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) is to pursue with reference to the matter referred to in my letter of the 14th day of August. I know the pressure you are under, and nothing but imperative necessity could make me add this matter to your burdens.

Very respectfully,
GEORGE A. ZABRISKIE, President.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it plainly appears that the Sugar Equalization Board saw the urgency of the President taking action, which had been delayed for several months, and so expressed itself in its communication. On the 22d day of September—the day following but one—the following letter was received by Mr. Zabriskie:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 22, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of September 20—

That is the letter just read—and to say that I shall bring it to the attention of the President at the first favorable opportunity.

Sincerely, yours,
RUDOLPH FORSTER,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. GEORGE A. ZABRISKIE,
President United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.),
112 Wall Street, New York City.

So, evidently the communication setting forth the necessity of acquiring this crop in order that we might have a normal supply of sugar was brought to the attention of the President; at least it was conveyed to him. Congress had not yet been apprised of the sugar shortage; no one had been found in the country to say that the law was not ample. The board was incorporated under the Lever bill, which is still in existence. No question was raised as to the authority of the board to act. All they were wanting the President to do was to authorize the board of directors to acquire the Cuban crop.

I do not know the reason why the President did not take this action. It is unfortunate that he did not act; but possibly it was due to his confidence in the judgment of this scholarly gentleman, Dr. Taussig. In any event, however, a serious and vital mistake was made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McNARY. I am very happy to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not also true that Mr. Glasgow, attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, in his testimony before the Agricultural Committee stated that it was necessary for Congress to adopt a policy? In other words, that they would not have purchased the Cuban crop of sugar, even though the President had suggested it, without the sanction of Congress?

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I can not answer his question directly, but I recall that Judge Glasgow intimated that it would require congressional action, for the reason, as I think he remarked, that the President had failed to employ the power given him under the Lever food-control bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield until I refresh his memory as to what Mr. Glasgow stated?

Mr. McNARY. I will yield, though I think I am quite conversant with the testimony.

Mr. HARRISON. I read from the hearings, on page 108. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked this question:

Senator NORRIS. If the President had authorized you, would you have done it?

Speaking of the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop.

Mr. GLASGOW. No, sir; not until Congress had given us the powers and they thought it proper. It would come back at last to the discretion of Congress as to whether they desired the distribution of sugar continued.

In response to that the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], said:

The CHAIRMAN. You said something that I think ought to be framed in a gold frame, to the effect that you did not feel like acting until Congress had its say.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for calling my attention to the testimony. I think I have it very vividly in mind and I recall the statement which he has read; but the statement does not bear the construction which the Senator has placed upon it, for the Lever bill is still in existence, and the board never asked Congress for any legislation. The reason Mr. Glasgow made that remark—and it should be taken in connection with his entire testimony and the existing situation—was that if the war ended and the treaty of peace were ratified, it was thought that under its terms the Lever bill would cease to exist, and he was speaking about legislation which was necessary and designed to carry over the Sugar Equalization Board during the year 1920. That is the answer to the proposition, but in no way does it excuse the President for not advising and directing the Sugar Equalization Board to buy the Cuban crop. I do not mean to stand here and censure the President for a willful act; but I say that he committed a grave error, and the responsibility rests on him, and on him alone, and not on Congress. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McNARY. I yield for a question.

Mr. GAY. Did not the Sugar Equalization Board have the power to buy the crop of 1920 without any authorization from Congress or any advice from the President?

Mr. McNARY. In connection with that I think we must take into consideration the fact that they were acting as a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, in which corporation the President held all the stock, and the stock had to be voted in order to authorize the board of directors to perform the function of acquiring the crop of sugar. They were not acting as the Sugar Equalization Board in a legislative capacity. If you will bear the distinction in mind between the corporate capacity of this board and its legislative capacity, you can see the necessity and needfulness of the President authorizing the board to acquire the sugar crop.

Mr. GAY. Just one other question, if the Senator will be kind enough to yield.

Mr. McNARY. I yield for a question, but I wish to speed along.

Mr. GAY. I understand the board of directors of the Sugar Equalization Board were reelected in June, and that under their charter they have full power to act without any advice from the President?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall hurry on, as I hope to finish this discussion in a very few moments. I have attempted in a few words to fix the responsibility on the President for the situation. That is history. What we must do now, in my opinion, is to enact some legislation on account of the inertia of those who should have enforced and invoked the provisions of the Lever bill. Therefore, I introduced Senate bill 3284, in order that the Sugar Equalization Board in its legislative capacity might be authorized to acquire sugar. That bill was introduced in Congress during the lengthy discussion on the peace treaty. Several times members of the committee sought to get the bill before the Senate, but that required unanimous consent, and, as there was some opposition to the bill, we were unsuccessful. At this time, however, I hope we may reach a determination of the measure.

The question naturally rises whether it is too late to do any good. That brings to me the duty of expression of opinion. A few days ago I attempted to make a survey of the sugar situation. I think I may state that all the raw sugars of the Hawaiian Islands have been purchased by two refiners in California. The beet sugar, perhaps in a large way, has moved to the consuming public, and the cane sugar of Louisiana has partially reached the public; but we must go back to the great sugar reservoir of Cuba. From the survey made by me a few days ago—and for my authority I will give the name of Mr. John H. Wilkins, a large wholesale grocer of this city, who was at one time connected with the Food Administration—it appears that about 750,000 tons of sugar of the Cuban crop of 1920 has been purchased by foreign governments; a like amount, 750,000 additional tons, has been acquired by refiners and speculators in this country, leaving probably 3,000,000 tons undisposed of in Cuba. If those figures are correct, there is no question in my mind that even now we can go into the Cuban market and acquire sugar which will give us a plentitude of this essential product during the season of 1920.

Mr. POMERENE. At what price?

Mr. McNARY. I will reach that later, but at this time I will say that I think by the control we would have over the sugar situation we could get it at a considerably less price than now obtains, which is about 13½ cents. I hope, however, to discuss that briefly in a moment.

Last year we purchased the whole of the Cuban crop, which was 4,000,000 tons. One-third of that quantity we allowed to pass into the hands of the royal British commission, which disposed of its holdings to Great Britain, to Italy, and to France. We took about 3,000,000 tons, the amount which I think is in Cuba now. That was the fund we used in 1919 and former years; and an equal amount of sugar we can use this year, which will carry us over the present shortage and bring us back to a safe basis and a normal flow of sugar.

Mr. President, this country uses normally about 4,000,000 tons of sugar per annum. This year the consumption may go to 4,500,000 tons. During the war, by a rationing process, our consumption was cut down to 75 pounds per capita. In the days before the war it was 84 pounds. This year it will be practically 93 pounds to an individual. The principal cause for that, if that is a pertinent matter in this connection, is national prohibition. As all observers must remark, when alcoholic beverages are taken away from the average individual accustomed to consuming them it creates a tremendous appetite for sugar, for ice cream, candy, soda water, and all other articles of which sugar is a part. Also it is known that sugar is a great energizing food, and when men who work hard and earn large salaries are in a position to acquire sugar, the first thing they do for themselves and their families is to go to the confectionery stand and indulge abundantly, and that situation has brought about an enormous consumption of sugar, perhaps 12 or 13 pounds per capita more than ever before in the history of the country.

There is a world shortage of sugar of perhaps 3,000,000 tons. England heretofore has used about the same quantity of sugar per capita as the United States, but they have rationed the people of England now to 52 pounds an individual. If, however, the people in their great desire to return to normal conditions and to feed up their appetites demand the normal supply of sugar, which is about 85 pounds per capita, England must of necessity enter into the Cuban market; and if she enters into the Cuban market and takes the sugar, providing she has the credits, a shortage that has never been anticipated will occur in this country.

Before the war the beet sugars grown in Austria-Hungary, in the Balkan States, and in Germany supplied a great part of the demand in Europe; in fact, these countries had sugar for exportation; but when the armies of Germany invaded France the great refineries of northern France disappeared, the sugar land was given over to raising cereals, and in Austria-Hungary social conditions have been such as to prevent the normal supply of beet sugars being raised, with the result that there is a tremendous shortage in the world. I believe, however, that for 1919 and to-day there is not an actual shortage.

From September 1 until December of this year we had 350,000 tons more sugar available than at any other period in the history of the country. That is the actual fact, as testified by the members of the equalization board; but when it became known all over the country that the President had neglected to buy the Cuban crop and that there was a short crop of cane sugar in this country, perhaps not more than 100,000 tons of the 4,000,000 that we consume, speculation became rife; hoarding was plentiful by everybody—the confectioner, the housewife, the broker, the retailer, and perhaps the refiner—and that situation has brought about the present shortage, in my opinion.

The way to correct it is for the American Government, the strongest financial nation in the world, perhaps the only one capable of buying to a great extent, to go down and acquire the Cuban crop; and when the producers of cane sugar in Cuba find that there is only one market open to them in the world, and that is the American market, they will have to come down in their price to an extent that will give them a fair profit and not a hold-up profit.

Mr. Herbert Hoover said to me some weeks ago, after a careful review of the world sugar situation and the cost of raising the Cuban crop, that tremendous profits would inure to the Cuban producers if they received 6½ cents a pound. We paid them last year at the northern ports 5½ cents. I have been told that some raw sugar has been sold this year as high as 13½ cents. That is the raw sugar, the unrefined product. That is mulcting the American public at a figure that is criminal; and, Mr. President, to realize what this means in the way of a toll upon the American public it is only necessary for me to state that if we consume, and we do consume, more than 4,000,000 tons, an increase of 1 cent a pound means $80,000,000 to the American public, and an increase of 10 cents a pound means $800,000,000 to the consuming public of America, a sum nearly equal to the cost of administration of the Government prior to the war. This statement itself ought to bring to our hearts a desire to pass some legislation corrective, if possible, of the conditions that obtain.

Much might be said upon the necessity of legislation, Mr. President. I hope that some action may be taken to-day that the House may get this bill and pass it; and I sincerely believe, after a careful study of all the conditions that relate to this problem, that if we go into the Cuban market and acquire the sugar the consumer of America will save millions and hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to delay the Senator, but he speaks of going into the market and buying the Cuban sugar. Are we in time to do that?

Mr. McNARY. I stated, perhaps when the Senator from Idaho was away, that on a survey that I caused to be made during the last few days I find practically 3,000,000 tons left in Cuba, a sufficient quantity to satisfy the appetites of the American public.

Mr. BORAH. I did not hear that.

Mr. McNARY. A few weeks ago the Attorney General, or some attaché of his office, issued an order holding the beet-sugar people to 10½ cents a pound for raw sugar, which I think has been increased perhaps to 12 cents now, and after what they call an investigation the Louisiana refined sugar was placed at a figure around 18 cents. I do not want to discuss whether 18 cents or 20 cents is sufficient for Louisiana sugar, because it is a very small quantity of sugar, and I think we all want to see that industry protected so far as we can without fleecing the American public. I want to see it grow to be a grand and magnificent institution in the South. However, I can not conceive the philosophy of an economic rule that will permit refined beet sugar to be sold at 11 cents and refined cane sugar at 18 cents when they meet in competition around the common table. No one, however refined of appetite or technical of sight, can distinguish between refined beet sugar and refined cane sugar. They are as much alike as a row of pins. There is absolutely no difference; and when you go into the store, with Louisiana cane sugar at 18 or 19 cents and beet sugar at 11 or 12 cents, what is the situation? There will not be a divorcement of those two sugars, because there is a great affinity between them so far as their interests are concerned. And the public likes one as much as the other. The beet-sugar price will immediately go to 18 cents. It is an absurd economic proposition, and I was startled when I saw in the papers the ruling of the Attorney General. If this bill is passed, this absurd inequality will be forgotten, and the Sugar Equalization Board can get this sugar and make a compact with the refiner, the broker, and the retailer for a fair and reasonable price; and I have no doubt, even though somewhat delayed, that great benefit will inure to the consuming public.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McNARY. I was about to conclude. I hope that we may proceed with the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. GAY. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will be kind enough to answer it. I desire to know how we secured sugar from Cuba prior to the organization of the equalization board? It has always been the great market for the United States.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator knows the answer to that. Before we had the Sugar Equalization Board commercial reasons brought a fair supply to America; but those conditions do not obtain now, and why? Because there is a world shortage and the ordinary law of supply and demand is on the shelf for the present. We have competitors in the Cuban field, in the way of foreign governments, that we never had before. As I stated a few moments ago, the Central European States supplied Europe with sugar and had sugar to export. They have none now. There is a shortage of two or three million tons, and they are about to enter the market, and, in fact and indeed, have done so. That is the difference entirely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oregon takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

I understood the Senator to say that if this bill were passed, authorizing the equalization board or the equalization corporation to enter the Cuban market, we would then be the only market open to the Cuban grower of sugar; but it occurs to me, from the statement made by the Senator from Oregon, that we would meet there the competition of Great Britain, and that if the Government of the United States entered that market she would force the Government of Great Britain and the government of almost every other great country needing a sugar supply to enter the market also; and would we not then be competing with those opposing governments in the Cuban market?

Mr. McNARY. No doubt that is true, Mr. President; but I think it is generally conceded that the Cuban would rather have the American dollar than any money that England or any other foreign nation has. The rate of exchange is against the foreign countries in competition with America.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. McNARY. We can buy it a whole lot cheaper than they can buy it, because we have better security, better credits, and better money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then let me ask the Senator from Oregon whether the American private purchaser would not have exactly the same advantage as against the foreign private purchaser?

Mr. McNARY. There is no question about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How, then, is the situation changed? Is it not a fact, then, that instead of individual purchasers in the United States going into the Cuban market and individual purchasers from Great Britain going into the Cuban market you simply consolidate the purchasers and the one Government bids against the other Government, with exactly the same advantages and disadvantages arising from the rates of exchange?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, I do not think so at all. If you recall the statement made a little while ago from an abstract of an offer made by the Cuban growers, they desire, in order to stabilize prices, to sell in bulk to the American Government. They do not want to deal with the individual speculators of New York and Montana, nor do they desire to deal with the refiner. They want to come together and sell all their raw sugars to this Government, which is their great buyer, as they did last year, and would rather do that, as shown by the evidence here, than to sell to persons here and there, private individuals, or to foreign Governments. So, in my opinion, if we authorize the Sugar Equalization Board to go into Cuba, with the credit of this country back of it, which it would have, and tell those growers, as we did a year ago, that we would take all their sugar and stabilize their price so that there would be no fluctuation in it, we will be able to get all the sugar that is left in Cuba, I have no doubt.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that is a different reason now assigned by the Senator from Oregon, with reference to which I desire some further information. I have listened very attentively to the Senator from Oregon, and have been enlightened by his discussion of the bill. But I can not quite understand that reason, either. I can not quite understand why the Cuban producer of sugar would not prefer, under the existing circumstances, with the great world shortage, to take the benefit of any higher price that would result from open competition, rather than selling to the Government of the United States at a lower price than the current market price. I can not quite see where the inducement would come in.

Mr. McNARY. I can not reflect, I will say to the Senator from Montana, the mind of the Cuban grower; but I do know from a general study of the conditions and from the record produced before the committee that stabilization of price is a great element to those people, and they would rather sell at a certain figure that would give them a profit than to sell here and there to one individual at one figure and to another at another figure. They want the good will of the American Government, too, and they want to sell to us in the future; and it is their desire plainly, it appears to me, to sell to the American Government the bulk of what remains.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On what information does the Senator make that statement?

Mr. McNARY. I gather it from the plea they made to the Sugar Equalization Board to take their crop.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Cuban planters?

Mr. McNARY. The Cuban planters.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator while he was going on, but I want to ask him one or two questions about the bill.

I see that the bill makes no provision for the fund with which to purchase this very large amount of sugar. I ask the Senator what his idea is about that matter. Where will the money come from with which this four and a half million tons of sugar needed by the American people will be purchased?

Mr. McNARY. I will ask the Senator, as a member of the committee, a question in answer to his question. Where did it come from last year, for the 1919 crop?

Mr. RANSDELL. I believe they had about $5,000,000 to operate on.

Mr. McNARY. I think they still have five million, plus the thirty million in profits.

Mr. RANSDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McNARY. They still have the original capital, plus thirty millions of profit they made by the retention of 38 cents on a hundred pounds of sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is a very different proposition from purchasing the Cuban crop last year, and purchasing the entire crop made in Hawaii, made in Porto Rico, made in the beet-sugar States of the West, and the sugar made in Louisiana.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to rush along. I do not want to yield to the Senator to make a speech. I have answered the question.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; then I will ask the Senator another question. I understood the Senator to say that the beet-sugar crop was the crop that controlled the whole situation, and that if we could purchase the beet-sugar crop that would settle it.

Mr. McNARY. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not make a statement of that kind at all.

Mr. RANSDELL. That was the substance of what the Senator said.

Mr. McNARY. It was not the substance of what I said. I did not say a thing about beet sugar of the West, which amounts to only about 700,000 tons, controlling anything.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not say beet sugar. I understood the Senator to say that the Cuban sugar would control the situation.

Mr. McNARY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he said beet sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. It may be that I said "beet." I beg the Senator's pardon if I used the word "beet." The Senator said the Cuban sugar would control the situation?

Mr. McNARY. Yes, I did.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then I will ask the Senator if the whole matter could not be settled by passing a law requiring or authorizing the equalization board to purchase the Cuban crop and not interfere with the beet-sugar growers and the Louisiana growers?

Mr. McNARY. Perhaps so, Mr. President. But when we speak of sugar, we speak of it as a product, without reference to any climate or any growers who may produce it. Under the Lever Act sugar was sugar, and was purchased as such, and, of course, if the beet-sugar men, or the cane-sugar men in the South, want to come without the provisions of the bill, an amendment to that effect could be offered, and I will submit that to the judgment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is it not a fact that the Sugar Equalization Board did not purchase the beet-sugar crop last year or the Louisiana cane crop last year, but that they did purchase merely the Cuban crop?

Mr. McNARY. I stated in my argument that they came to a voluntary agreement with the local or domestic growers, and finally they fixed a price that was satisfactory to them, namely, 9 cents a pound.

Mr. RANSDELL. If they could get along without purchasing the domestic crop for the last year, why give them power now to purchase the domestic crop? Is not that making an interference now with the domestic producers that we did not find necessary to make while the war was in existence?

Mr. McNARY. I do not think so. But I want to say to the Senator in a very friendly spirit that that is a proposition which can be corrected by an amendment, and I suggest to the Senator, if he thinks the growers in Louisiana should have that protection, that he offer an amendment. I am discussing the bill, and not any proposed or suggested or thought-of amendments.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that that is a matter which is very pertinent. It came up in our committee when we had the bill under discussion, and I tried to offer an amendment of that kind. I offered to support the bill if you would limit it to foreign sugars. I have said that to put it in its present shape would interfere with the domestic product, and I would be compelled to fight it, but that if you would limit it to foreign sugars I would support it.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to have the statement I send to the desk, which appeared under a Washington date line in one of our home papers, made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEDERAL CONTROL OF SUGAR TO END—CONGRESS'S FAILURE TO ACT UNDOUBTEDLY WILL MEAN HIGHER PRICES.

WASHINGTON, December 4.

The Government will not attempt to control the disposition and sale of sugar after the Sugar Equalization Board is dissolved on December 31.

Attorney General Palmer, in making this announcement to-day, said that as no funds had been provided by Congress for carrying on the work of handling sugar, the Department of Justice would confine its efforts to the punishment of profiteers.

Mr. Palmer said he had put the proposition up to Congress, as he lacked "both the power and the facilities for obtaining tangible results." After officials had outlined plans for a continuance of the control under the supervision of the Department of Justice, he said, the necessary funds and authority were not forthcoming.

Mr. Palmer's action was accepted as opening up the sources of more sugar supplies by permitting refiners to pay more for the Cuban raw stock. It also was believed to mean that sugar prices would soar. The department will continue to hunt down profiteers, but without means of checking up on the cost to the refiner or without control of the price at which the supplies come into this country. It was believed domestic consumers would be forced to pay high prices after January 1.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seems to me that some action ought to be taken by Congress or some authority given to protect the American public in this emergency and condition. It has been stated and admitted here that the beet-sugar producers can make money by selling sugar at 10 cents a pound. It has been stated that we can buy, or could have bought, Cuban sugar at 9 cents, and that they could make money on it at that price or less. It has been insisted here that the Louisiana crop is very short, and that they have only 100,000 tons, one-fortieth of the amount of sugar that is consumed in the United States, and that they can not get along very well without 17 cents a pound.

A wholesale merchant in my State wired me that he could not purchase sugar in New York or through any other of the usual channels of trade, and that he was prohibited by a Government agency from buying beet sugar at 10 cents a pound or any other price. The effect of that will be to compel him to pay whatever price is asked of him for sugar in the zone in which he is allowed to deal, and now the people are paying 20 cents a pound for sugar in my town. The only question here, it seems to me, is, shall the whole United States of America be compelled to buy sugar at 20 cents a pound in order that a hundred thousand tons of sugar may be sold at 17 cents a pound?

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. GAY. Has the Senator any idea what would have been the price of sugar during the war period had not all of the producers patriotically entered into a contract with the equalization board?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not want to injure anybody. I am not talking——

Mr. GAY. I merely would like to get an expression from the Senator on that point.

Mr. KIRBY. I know that they got as much as their sugar was worth during the war—all of them.

Mr. GAY. That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. KIRBY. That is the result of the whole operation.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Hoover stated, in testifying before a committee, that he thought sugar would have gone to 25 or 30 cents a pound during the war.

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly, and the Government took charge of it to prevent any such outrageous exaction as that; and the Government ought to take charge of it now to prevent any such exaction as is being demanded of the American people.

Mr. GAY. The Senator believes, then, that the Government should enter private enterprise and engage in a business that private individuals are engaged in. Is that his point of view?

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator believes that because of unusual conditions produced on account of the war our whole industrial capacity was strung up to win the war. It takes the production of four men in industry to supply one man fighting at the front. We had 4,800,000 men in the Army, and it took four men at home to supply every one of them. We had to bend every energy to the winning of the war.

Now the war is over. Here are 100,000 tons of sugar in the United States that we want a fair market price for, and shall it be allowed to control the market and run up the price of sugar to 20 cents a pound for all the people of the United States? It would be far better for the Government to pay 17 cents a pound for the 100,000 tons of sugar and buy this other sugar at 6 cents, equalizing the price and bringing it down to 10 or 11 cents, and let the people have and enjoy the benefit of it. Nobody would suffer then, and everybody would get a fair price for his sugar. Why should not that be done?

Mr. GAY. The Senator is somewhat inaccurate in his statement that the people all over the United States are paying that price. Let me ask him whether he knows why that price prevails in that section of the country?

Mr. KIRBY. My understanding is that it prevails because some authority has designated a zone and compelled our people to buy in that zone, and they are prevented from buying elsewhere.

Mr. GAY. Does the Senator know what authority it was which created that zone?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know, and I do not care. All I am talking about is the injustice resulting from the fact.

Mr. GAY. I think the Senator ought to know.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to getting the information, but it does not affect the result.

Mr. GAY. The Sugar Equalization Board created the zones, and we are seeking at this time to get away from war-time control, and to get away from the zone system.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was going to ask substantially the same question of the Senator, namely, why is it that under the law, which I understand is still in effect, a zone has been established, in which zone, which includes our part of the country, his State and mine, we have to pay 20 cents a pound for sugar, when sugars in other zones of the country bring a very much lower price?

In this connection, if I may have the attention for a moment of the author of the bill, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the Senator understands that in the zone in which I live, which includes Tennessee, the board of equalization has fixed a wholesale price of 17 cents, as I recall, on sugar, and it is retailing at about 20 cents a pound. It is selling at a very much less price in various other parts of the United States. Should there not be some provision in this bill which would prevent the Sugar Equalization Board from fixing one price on sugar in one part of the country and another price in another part of the country?

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator that this bill does not contemplate price fixing.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the original act, of which this is an amendment, does contemplate price fixing, and under it this monstrous situation has been developed, namely, that in the part of the country where I live there is a zone set apart in which there is a price on sugar 50 to 100 per cent higher than the price in other parts of the country. That ought to be remedied. Should it not be remedied by this bill that the Senator proposes, if we pass it?

Mr. McNARY. I do not see how you can remedy it by the pending bill when the bill does not contain a provision authorizing the board to fix the price, or create zones, or to ration it.

Mr. KIRBY. I think I can answer the question. If we have enough sugar to supply the market and the wants of the people, it does not make any difference about zones; none need be established, and those in existence can be wiped out or abrogated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3288.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that the sugar bill has been displaced at this time. I do not care to speak further now, but when it shall again come up I have a few further observations to submit on that measure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken for about an hour and a half,

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GAY. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I will ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. McKELLAR. I submit a motion in the form of a resolution reduced to writing, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table. I give notice that I shall call it up at the earliest moment.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce with instructions to strike out all after the enacting clause and to report back a bill containing substantially the following:

First. Terminate Federal control and restore the railroads to their several owners in a manner by which active competition in service may be restored and maintained.

Second. For the purpose of enabling carriers by railroad subject to the commerce act properly to serve the public during the transition period immediately following the termination of Federal control; provide for new loans to the railroads under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and with reasonable limitations upon these loans, together with a temporary guaranty of present income for a period of not longer than six months, the House bill provision on the subject of loans to the railroads being deemed a wise and proper provision.

Third. Give to the Interstate Commerce Commission increased powers, including a supervisory jurisdiction over the arbitration of labor troubles, the issuance of railroad securities, and the chartering of additional lines to the end that railroad securities may be stabilized and rendered a safe investment to the public; all dealings of the several railroad corporations with their employees; all subjects arising out of Federal control; refunding the carriers' indebtedness to the United States; and the establishment of minimum as well as maximum rates.

Fourth. Provide that the existing rates shall be continued in effect, with full power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise and fix reasonable rates, to the end that the railroads and the public shall be fairly treated and that each well and efficiently and economically managed railroad shall have a fair chance to earn a reasonable and just income, but without governmental guaranty, and at the same time providing that the railroads giving the public the best service and managing themselves the best shall make the greatest incomes, and that all railroads shall have and retain such incomes as they may rightfully earn, without dividing any portion thereof with the Government or with other less-favored roads.

[Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed his speech, and after having spoken altogether for about three hours and a half he yielded the floor for the day.]

RECESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, December 11, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 10, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that Thou dost live and reign in the hearts of all pure men. Since religion is the life of God in the soul and though men may differ as to the nonessentials, yet in the last analysis they unite in the essentials and worship Thee in spirit and in truth.

Let Thy blessing descend copiously upon these Representatives of a great people, guide them in their deliberations that they may establish good government throughout our land. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that Senate concurrent resolution 9 be stricken from the Calendar, the purpose for which it was put upon the Calendar, approving the course of the President in the industrial convention, not being applicable on account of the dissolving of the convention.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman bring that up some other morning?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of the American petroleum producers in Mexico. This is a memorial——

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman should defer that until to-morrow morning. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Public Lands.

PREFERRED RIGHT OF HOMESTEAD ENTRY FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands I call up House joint resolution 20.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 20) giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry.

The SPEAKER. This is on the Union Calendar and the House automatically——

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is privileged. This committee has the right to report this resolution at any time, and therefore it can not be brought up on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, the resolution was not reported as a privileged resolution, and therefore it is not a privileged resolution. It is only privileged when reported from the floor.

Mr. SANFORD. It is privileged in the sense that the committee can call it up at any time that it sees fit, and if the committee wanted this resolution considered they could have followed that course and had the resolution brought up at any time.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I understand the resolution only will be privileged when it is reported from the floor. In accordance with the rule a resolution is never privileged unless it is reported from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider whether it is privileged or not; the Chair is not familiar with the resolution.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is a joint resolution for the reservation of public lands for the benefit of settlers.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if this resolution is privileged under the rule. Resolutions and bills from the Committee on the Public Lands reserving lands for homestead settlers are privileged, but this resolution does not reserve lands for homestead settlers. It makes special provision with regard to lands which may be open.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to section 723 of the Manual, where it states, "but privileged reports must still be made from the floor." Now, unless the report is made from the floor it is not privileged, and this report was made in the ordinary way from the committee, and was not made from the floor, even though it has a privileged status, and I doubt, even with the committee reporting it from the floor, whether it would have a privileged status or would be entitled to be reported from the floor.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that question it seems to me it is clear that the report from the floor is a characteristic of a privileged resolution, and is not a test of whether it is privileged or not. If the resolution is privileged the committee can bring it up from the floor at any time, and that is the method provided by the rule. And the fact that the committee does not bring it up from the floor does not change the character of the resolution in any respect.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say in reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wyoming that it is not really a reservation but provides a preference to a certain class of citizens?

Mr. SANFORD. The substance of the bill is that certain rights shall be reserved in these public lands for a certain class of people, and it seems to me it brings it clearly within the rule making it privileged. Certain rights in these public lands are reserved by the joint resolution for a certain class of persons. The only way it is distinguished from a general reservation is that it is for the benefit of a certain class and not everybody. I have no opposition to the joint resolution, but I think it should be brought up some time other than on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, that reservation, under Rule LVI, must be for the benefit of "actual and bona fide settlers."

Mr. SANFORD. It is to be understood, I think, that the persons to be benefited by this reservation are to be actual and bona fide settlers.

Mr. SINNOTT. Perhaps it may in the future, but it does not read that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the last statement of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under Rule LVI, bills for "the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers" are bills that have a privileged status when they are properly reported from the floor. This does not reserve lands for actual and bona fide settlers.

The SPEAKER. Why does it not?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Privilege is on the reservation of public lands. I notice this bill provides in reference to both public lands and Indian lands to entry. Has it ever been held that privilege extended to the reservation or the opening of Indian lands and settlements?

Mr. SANFORD. I do not know much about the Indian lands. I should rather leave that to some other gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not recall.

Mr. SANFORD. I think if they are not public in character they could not very well be opened up.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We have the power to dispose of Indian lands, and this bill relates to the disposition of Indian lands, not public lands. The bill at least draws a distinction between public lands and Indian lands. It is very seldom that this privilege has been exercised since I have been a Member of the House. My impression has been that it did not apply to Indian lands. Bills for the disposition of Indian lands, of course, usually come from the Committee on Indian Affairs. That committee does not have a privileged status. Now, suppose a bill is introduced providing for the disposition of Indian lands, and instead of being referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs it is referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Would that give the Committee on Public Lands the right to bring in a privileged report which the committee entitled to jurisdiction, the Indian Affairs Committee, could not bring in?

Mr. SANFORD. Let me ask the gentleman in reply to that: Suppose this committee had attempted to bring in this resolution as a privileged resolution. Do you think anybody would have gotten very far by making the point of order that there was nonprivileged matter included in the resolution, because the opening up was to extend to Indian lands as well as public lands? I think not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I rather think they would. They certainly would if the Indian land bills are not subject to privilege. And I do not think the purpose of the rule, in the first place, was to give a privileged status to bills providing for the opening and sale of Indian lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that only once or twice in the last 20 years has the Committee on Public Lands exercised the privilege of calling up a bill under the rule which has been referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield to a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that we have had very great difficulty in getting them up on a special privilege, and usually they vote against it?

Mr. MONDELL. There have been efforts made, but I think in only one, or possibly two, cases successfully, to bring up a bill under that rule. I can not agree with the chairman of the committee that the bill must be reported from the floor, although there have been rulings to that effect. But the privilege, Mr. Speaker, is confined to a very clearly defined class of bills. This bill does not come within that class. And further, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls attention to the fact that the bill also refers to Indian lands. Well, the rule is that a privileged matter, a bill or resolution containing privileged matter, loses that privilege if it contains any matter that is not privileged, and clearly Indian lands do not come within the privileges of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman say—and I think he is well informed—as to whether Indian lands have any public character or not?

Mr. MONDELL. They have a qualified public-land character sometimes. Sometimes they do not have a public-land character. They are frequently purely Indian lands, the property of Indians. That is the class of lands referred to in this case—lands that are property of the Indians, but disposed of one way and another by the Indian Office, the Interior Department, under a variety of laws. And in the latter days we do not buy Indian lands and transfer the title. They now never acquire the status of public lands, as they did in the olden time. Even where a reservation is opened and a cession is made the cession is conditional. The United States only becomes a trustee for the disposition of the land. The title remains with the Indian until the title passes to the individual.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the rule conferring privilege upon a committee should be strictly construed. It has been held upon a number of occasions, for instance, that the Committee on Appropriations, reporting an ordinary appropriation bill, not one of the regular appropriation bills, does not have a privileged status; that the Committee on Ways and Means reports many bills which do not have a privileged status. And the tendency has been to hold the question of privilege down quite strictly, because the committee reporting a privileged bill has the right to call it up at any time, interfering with all other processes of the House. I think the point made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], that a privileged bill must be reported from the floor of the House, is a good point, and that has been decided in a number of cases where it was attempted to call up a bill as a privilege which had not been reported from the floor of the House, and it makes a considerable degree of difference on a Union Calendar bill, for instance, whether it is reported from the floor of the House and points of order are reserved upon it, as there may be, or whether it is dropped into the basket and points of order can only be made in the Committee of the Whole. Further than that, this bill does not reserve public lands for settlement. It only provides a method of priority in the public settlement, and if it should be held that a bill doing that is privileged, then all bills relating to homesteads or settlement of public lands would be privileged.

Probably most of the bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands would be privileged if a mere incident regarding the settlement should give it a privileged status. And it seems to me very clear that this bill for those two reasons and for the additional reason that it includes Indian lands which are not public lands, does not have privilege under a reasonably strict construction of the rule.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the rule by which the privilege of a bill is to be determined should be strictly construed. But as against that we have all the recent precedents of the last few years, that the rule for Calendar Wednesday must also be strictly construed; and I think there is no rule of the House that the Speaker has considered himself required to protect with more care than the rule for the protection of Calendar Wednesday.

Now if, as the gentleman from Illinois insists, the committee, having the right to report at any time, can get its bills up on Calendar Wednesday merely by failure to report a privileged bill from the floor, the protection intended to be given to Calendar Wednesday entirely disappears. It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois can not consistently argue that the committee, having the right to report at any time, can decide not to report from the floor and by its own decision destroy Calendar Wednesday. It seems to me that argument is entirely untenable. The rule for the protection of Calendar Wednesday is well founded and has good reason back of it. The bills that should come up on Calendar Wednesday are very numerous and very important at the present time. I know myself of a number of very important bills that should come up, and if these committees, having the right to come in any time, can, upon their own decision, destroy Calendar Wednesday, then the rule as to Calendar Wednesday is entirely nullified.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that a committee having the right to report at any time could include in a privileged bill matter that was entitled to the privilege and which might properly be argued to belong to the jurisdiction of another committee and still have the privilege?

Mr. SANFORD. That question also troubles me somewhat, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what his opinion is on that question. I have not an answer ready. It does seem that that question is left open in the rules. But I would rather not consider that question at this time.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, that is settled in section 723 of the Manual. "The presence of matter not privileged with privileged matter destroys the privileged character of a bill." On that there are a number of decisions.

Mr. SANFORD. I know of that decision, but as to whether a committee can take that short cut to destroy Calendar Wednesday I am not advised.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, is it conceivable that a committee having the privilege of reporting at any time should endeavor to deprive itself of that privilege? The Committee on Public Lands has the same rights on Calendar Wednesday as any other committee, and having in addition to that certain privileges under the rule, it will not, of course, deprive itself of any privilege it may have because it may avail itself of Calendar Wednesday and its privileges also. I have no doubt that if the committee had felt that they were privileged on this class of bills they would have availed themselves of that privilege long since. I am confident that is true. But, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just stated, Speakers have always construed the rule of privilege rather narrowly and with a view of not unduly widening the privilege. A homestead bill, a bill providing for homestead settlement and for nothing else, coming from the Committee on Public Lands, is clearly privileged, and such bills have been taken, from time to time, under the privilege granted in the rule, but the committee has never considered that it had a privilege under the rule in respect to bills of this character, of this class.

The SPEAKER. The point raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is an interesting one. The Chair is disposed to agree with the gentleman from New York that the committee could not, by reporting a privileged bill through the basket, proceed to take advantage of its own wrong and acquire rights which otherwise it would not have. To the Chair the principal question is whether this is a privileged resolution or not. The language of the rule is very clear. It is limited to bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers, and it seems to the Chair that the distinction that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] makes, that this is not a resolution providing for the reservation of public lands, is well taken, since it merely provides that where there is a reservation an additional privilege shall be granted. The Chair thinks on that ground that the committee was right in not reporting this resolution from the floor, but placing it in the basket.

The point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is unquestionably true. The general rule is that when a privileged bill includes something not privileged, that takes away from it its privilege. That, however, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, raises an intricate question, which it is not necessary to consider here, because the Chair thinks this does not come strictly within the language of the rule, and it is not a resolution purely for the reservation of public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers.

Accordingly the Chair overrules the point of order. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the resolution, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House resolution No. 20, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 20, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 20) giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry.

Resolved, etc., That hereafter, for the period of two years following the passage of this act, on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal in which officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who have served not less than 90 days in the Army or Navy of the United States in the war with Germany and been honorably discharged therefrom shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead law, if duly qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make any and all regulations necessary to carry into full force and effect the provisions hereof.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that this resolution needs any extended argument. The best arguments for the resolution are the mere reading of the bill and the statement of its purposes.

The resolution is designed to give the soldiers and sailors, those who have served in the war against Germany, a preference right for 60 days when any lands now withdrawn from entry are hereafter restored to entry. The resolution is in line with a great deal of legislation that has been pending and has received considerable discussion throughout the Nation, and it is in line with the resolution adopted at the late meeting of the American Legion. I feel at this time that no extended discussion of the bill is necessary. I therefore reserve the balance of my time. Does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] desire some time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have had no requests for time. If any gentleman desires to speak in opposition to the bill, I will be glad to yield him time.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma for a question.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if these soldiers have the right to file a declaratory statement through an agent, the same as Civil War veterans are allowed to make filings and declaratory statements through an agent?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am not prepared to answer that. Section 2 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make any and all regulations necessary to carry into full force and effect the provisions of the act. That may or may not be broad enough to authorize the Secretary to do that. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not followed the legislation on public lands very closely, and I just wondered whether the right to make a declaratory statement under the homestead law through an agent would be accorded to a veteran of the late war the same as it is accorded to a soldier of the Civil War.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am not prepared to answer that question, although I doubt the advisability of anything of that kind. It lends itself to all sorts of schemes, speculation, and the drumming up of applicants by these agents scattered all over the country.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman is aware that if a soldier lives in the East, or even in the Middle West, it requires the expenditure of from $100 to $300 to enable him to go to the Western States where the public lands will be opened to entry to see whether he can get an entry or not, and if he fails, then he has all that expense for nothing. It seems to me we ought to give to the veterans of the war with Germany the same privileges to make a filing through an agent—that is, without going to the land—that we have given to Civil War veterans, which they now have. I do not see any reason for discrimination.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman very well know that none of the openings which will be made in the future will be very big, and if everybody in the United States goes out there, ninety-nine out of one hundred will not get anything?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but that is just the difficulty. Thousands of soldiers would go to these little openings, I suppose, ten times as many as could get quarter sections of land. When they got there I suppose most of them would be disappointed, and they would have had the expense of going perhaps a thousand or two thousand miles and when they got there find there was nothing for them.

Mr. SINNOTT. It may be that in a proper case, where there is going to be a large opening, the Secretary of the Treasury, under section 2, would promulgate the necessary rules to prevent the things which the gentleman is apprehensive about.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think he would have the authority to do that.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice that in the committee amendment, on page 2, line 10, it says:

Provided, That the rights and benefits conferred by this act shall not extend to any person who, having been drafted for military service under the provisions of the selective-service act, shall have refused to render military service or to wear the uniform of a soldier of the United States.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think that the words "sailor or marine" should go in after the word "soldier," so as to make that provision harmonious with the other parts of the bill and make it perfectly clear as to what it means? Then, back in line 8, where it says "military service," it seems to me it ought to read "military or naval service."

I make these suggestions to the chairman of the committee for his consideration.

Mr. SINNOTT. "Military service" is a very broad and general term.

Mr. PARRISH. Would it include naval service?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it would.

Mr. PARRISH. Would the word "soldier" include sailor or marine?

Mr. SINNOTT. This was drafted with a great deal of care in the department. I think the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] had a personal conference with both the Attorney General's office and the War Department.

Mr. PARRISH. Would the word "soldier" include "sailor or marine"? I do not think it would, as a matter of law.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the term "military service" would include them all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest that the draft was applicable to the Army, and that the conscientious objectors and those who refused to wear the uniform were not men drafted for the Navy, because men were not drafted into the Navy, but into the Army.

Mr. PARRISH. In reply to the gentleman I will suggest that on page 1, line 9, of the bill it provides for soldiers, sailors, or marines, and I think all parts of the bill ought to be uniform. I do not think any conscientious objectors or slackers ought to have the benefits of the bill, and I want to make it certain to prevent that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I see no objection to letting those words go in if they are necessary.

Mr. SINNOTT. I see no particular objection to them. I think they are superfluous.

Mr. BEE. Along the same line as the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. PARRISH], I agree absolutely with the committee provision that conscientious objectors and slackers ought not to receive any of the benefits of this act, but is there not danger that anyone making application for an entry under this act would as a legal proposition bear the burden of affirmatively establishing that he was not a conscientious objector or slacker? In other words, would not the Commissioner of the Land Office, if he be the proper person, require a soldier applying for an entry to make affirmative proof that he was not a conscientious objector?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. His discharge papers would show that.

Mr. SINNOTT. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests, the discharge would show that. He would have probably to furnish his discharge or a certified copy of his discharge papers, which would show at once his status on discharge.

Mr. BEE. Are these conscientious objectors in the attitude of having rendered any service as contemplated by this bill, on page 1—

Who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States.

I want to leave them out, but I do not want to put on the real soldier the burden of proving that he was not a conscientious objector.

Mr. SINNOTT. The conscientious objectors do not receive an honorable discharge.

Mr. BEE. I make this further suggestion to the gentleman from Oregon: A man might have served well in France and yet be court-martialed after he came to this country and not receive an honorable discharge. Yet under the language of the bill he served.

Mr. SINNOTT. Line 1, page 2, requires an honorable discharge.

Mr. BEE. I simply want to be absolutely certain that the good soldier is not laden with the burden of proving that he was not a conscientious objector.

Mr. SINNOTT. The bill says:

Who has served in the Army or Navy of the United States in the war with Germany and been honorably discharged therefrom.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman is satisfied with the provision, I am.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. TILSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, discharges given to these men, while not dishonorable in the technical sense of the term, there is written across the face of the discharge the fact that the man rendered no military service. So that, under the terms of the bill as drawn, it seems to me that he would be precluded from taking advantage of this legislation. While not a technically dishonorable discharge, the statement is made upon it that the man refused to render military service, which is almost the language of the bill.

Mr. MOONEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MOONEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the language on page 2, line 1, would cover those persons who had been transferred from the active service to the Reserve and returned to civil life. My understanding is they have ruled that a person transferred to the Reserve is not in the Regular Army service.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is not in the Regular Army service?

Mr. MOONEY. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have an amendment to meet that situation.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. It has been suggested to me that a great many conscientious objectors received an honorable discharge before there was agitation to prevent it. Would not that compel the serviceable soldiers to prove that they were not conscientious objectors?

Mr. SINNOTT. I doubt if there were very many in that status. But that would come out in the final proof.

Mr. BEE. It is purely a question of law whether or not this provision would put this burden on the soldier who had been discharged to prove that he was not a conscientious objector?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. One designated as a conscientious objector, to be such would have to make a claim for such exemption at the time the attempt was made to induct him into the service. It ought to be a very easy matter for a man to establish the fact that he was not a conscientious objector, because the War Department could easily ascertain the truth of his assertion. I think it is as little as a soldier can do when he is applying for something that the Government gives him, by reason of having given service to his country, to show that he was not a conscientious objector. Unfortunately many so-called conscientious objectors who flatly refused to don our uniform and refused to serve our flag and country during the war, were paid for full time and received honorable discharges after the armistice was signed. They performed no service whatever.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The Naval Reserve Force, many of whom went into the Navy during the war, are not discharged at all; but, as I understand the situation, are given an indefinite furlough or placed upon the inactive reserve list. They are to all practical intents and purposes discharged from the service, but technically they stand on the records of the Navy as members of the Naval Reserve Force instead of being actually discharged. In fact, they might in case of emergency be recalled to the colors.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Do they have any certificate showing that status?

Mr. TILSON. I believe that they do; and that it shows on the certificate that they are not in the active service but in the Naval Reserve.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would not that be sufficient?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will state to the gentleman that in order to meet that question raised by the gentleman from Ohio, I propose to offer an amendment, on page 2, after the word "honorably" to insert "separated or," and after the word "therefrom" to insert the following: "placed in the Regular Army Reserves," so that it will read:

been honorably separated or discharged therefrom or placed in the Regular Army Reserves.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will that include the Naval Reserve?

Mr. TILSON. Why not add the word "Naval"?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will add the word "Naval," so that it will read "Regular Army or Naval Reserve." Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I notice on the calendar the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands on the 1st of August, entitled:

A bill (H. R. 487) to provide employment and rural homes for those who have served with the military and naval forces through the reclamation of lands, to be known as the "National soldier settlement act."

A great many discharged soldiers in the country are waiting with a good deal of anxiety and solicitude, as I have personal knowledge of conditions in my own State, to know whether or not the Congress of the United States expects to take any action upon that bill. I had hoped to ask the distinguished Republican leader, Mr. MONDELL, for some information on that proposition, but I note that he is not in the Chamber.

Mr. BLANTON. May I suggest to the gentleman that the great G. O. P. committee is meeting to-day, and probably he is an attendant on that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want, in the absence of the Republican leader, who is the author of the bill I have referred to for the benefit of the discharged soldiers, and one they are much interested in and waiting for some action of Congress upon—I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, Mr. SINNOTT, if he can give the committee and the country and the ex-soldiers of the country any assurance that that bill will be taken up at an early date; and if not, what arrangement has been made by the Republican steering committee and those in authority on the other side with reference to that particular piece of legislation?

I do not ask this question in any captious or partisan spirit, but in good faith, because I know in my State of at least one colony of 200 families of ex-soldiers of the late war waiting to find out what Congress is going to do with reference to this bill. I think it is due them and the country for some statement as to the policy on that proposition. I will be glad to yield the remainder of my five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon to give us some information on that subject.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oregon is not one in authority. Furthermore, the gentleman from Oregon does not care to violate the rules of the House by going outside of the discussion of the bill under consideration. This is Calendar Wednesday, and debate is confined to the bill under the rules. The gentleman from Oregon does not care to violate that rule. However, as far as I am able to assure the gentleman, I can assure him that there will be legislation on the subject. At least, there will be as far as I am able to promote it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, that is rather an evasive answer—"there will be legislation." I am sure there will be legislation of some character and description.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Oregon is not in a position of authority to speak for the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken in that, because he is in a position of high authority, by virtue of his position as chairman of the great Committee on the Public Lands, which committee could originate and which committee has the power and authority to call up this bill for consideration, if it wants to, to-day.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Oregon has reported a bill to the House from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the assurance which the gentleman has given me the only assurance that he is in a position to state with reference to this legislation—that there will be some sort of legislation on the subject?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, the gentleman from Oregon does not make it in that hazy way that the gentleman from Alabama wishes to put into his mouth.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What legislation will be brought in upon this subject or pressed upon this subject?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, there is a bill reported at the present time——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this discussion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in affording all proper relief for our returned soldiers, and so wish to know the construction of the chairman of the committee of the language appearing in line 10, on page 1 of the resolution—officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States in the war with Germany and been honorably discharged therefrom.

I see that the words "not less than 90 days" have been stricken out by a committee amendment. I am wondering whether it would be necessary to have any additional qualifying language or limiting or explanatory word before the word "served." In other words, in some of our legislation we have prefaced the right to participate in certain war benefits by the word "actual."

There is no limitation here, no apparent limitation, and I am wondering what the interpretation of those who have charge of the bill is as to the word "served." Does it mean anyone, even though he was called so late as the latter part of October, 1918, selected under the last conscriptive-service apportionment, who, in fact, never went to a military camp, but merely had the call to service from his local drafting board? Is it the interpretation of the chairman of the committee that such a person would be included, or is it necessary that he be enrolled in the service of the United States?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the language that has been carried from the Civil War days in statutes giving preference rights to soldiers and sailors, and I think one would have to be enrolled.

Mr. GARD. I think so, too; but would it not be best to carry in this bill an amendment of the nature I indicate?

Mr. SINNOTT. I doubt very much whether it would be wise to amend it, as this language has received interpretation from time to time by the War Department and also by the Interior Department. This is the language that has been used for some time, and I think it would be unwise to modify it.

Mr. GARD. My recollection is that the language of the war-risk act and other language conferring war benefits provides that the person shall have been enrolled in the service of the United States. By that is meant, I should say, that the person has presented himself and has had his name placed upon the roll for actual military service.

Mr. SINNOTT. As I said before, this is language that has been carried in the statutes from Civil War days, and I believe it would be unwise to venture on a modification. I do not know what it would lead us into.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman tell us how much land is likely to become available for the soldiers under this act?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Secretary reports that that is more or less problematical. There is not very much.

Mr. WELLING. Did the committee have any information before it as to any number of acres that would be thrown open to entry from forest reservations?

Mr. SINNOTT. We have had no specific information. The only information we have is contained in the Secretary's report, and in that he says that the area of said lands will doubtless fall far short of satisfying the demands for homes that will ultimately be made. We have no particular information on that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to ask a question about the language on page 2 of the bill, beginning in line 2—"if qualified thereunder."

I am not certain about the present law. My memory is that service in the Army in the Civil War would entitle a soldier to make entry regardless of the age. A great many of these soldiers in the late war were under 21 years of age. Would a soldier under 21 years of age be allowed to make entry under the provisions of this resolution?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think he would.

Mr. MORGAN. Is not the gentleman afraid that those words, "if qualified thereunder"——

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, I think that clause refers to the other qualifications.

Mr. MORGAN. So the gentleman thinks that under existing law a man under 21 years of age, if he is a soldier and is otherwise qualified, could make an entry under this resolution?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], the act of August 31, 1918, specifically provides that soldiers under the age of 21 may enter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make this inquiry. This resolution proposes to give the soldiers of the recent war a preference for 60 days in making homestead entries. How will that work? Where land is thrown open that is somewhat valuable, will not the soldiers in that locality, regardless of whether they ever intend to live on the land or not, make the homestead entries, so as to practically absorb the land?

Everybody knows that this has been frequently done in the past. There are many underground methods, maybe above-ground methods, by which where a man has made his entry and does not desire to occupy the land he relinquishes his claim and lets somebody else who has paid him for the privilege make a new entry, theoretically impossible put practically done. Will not that be the effect of this? Is not that the way these have always worked? Give a preference for 60 days. If the land is valuable somebody will get it. If the gentleman from Oklahoma had his way about it, I judge, it might be obtained through an agent; have the land out in Oklahoma and the agent for the soldier in Chicago, who never had any intention whatever of leaving Chicago. But as it is, I take it, if the land is in Colorado it will be all filed upon by soldiers in Colorado—all that is of any good. Oh, a few of them may take land, but most of them will never go on the land at all. They relinquish their homestead entry for a consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In doing so, however, the entryman would of course waive his right even to make another entry. His homestead entry would be used in making the application and later relinquished.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; but there are a good many of these soldiers, and most of them have no intention of making homesteads anywhere; but if they can get paid something, they are going to take it. After the Civil War we provided that certain soldiers of the Civil War should have the right to certain public lands throughout the country. That right was not exercised in many cases—in most cases. Some time after I first came to Congress some bright agent had discovered that these soldiers not having taken the land were entitled to script, and they were selling that script at from $3 to $5 an acre. That is not covered in this case.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But the sale of script only applies where they have taken a portion of their entry and got script for the balance of it. It was where he had actually gone on part of the land and applied probably for half or a quarter and was entitled to script for the remaining 160 acres.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is better informed than I am, although I think there were cases where script applied regardless to their going on the land. I think that was so in some cases.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In the Mexican War but not the Civil War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, the Civil War.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there is any more reason to assume soldiers are going to file upon the land they do not want than anybody else are going to file on land they do not want. If anybody is to take the land and have the right to relinquish his right and sell to somebody else, I do not think there will be a very large per cent of that; but if there be, why should not the soldier have that right the same as any other citizen, and why should we assume the soldier is trying to deceive the Government of the United States and get something for nothing any more than anybody else?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He is not deceiving the United States, but only exercising a right which the Government gives to him, and wherever you give a man a preference right he is disposed to exercise it even though practically it is of no benefit to him.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why should not the soldier have the same as anybody else?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, nobody should have it, and the law tries to prevent it, it is true, but you encourage it in this case.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman's apprehension is that the soldier will transfer his preference right under this bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. My apprehension is that he will file under his preference right, and after a while when the time comes he will relinquish the right and let somebody else take the land he had entered upon.

Mr. SINNOTT. Of course, he can not relinquish to anyone else except the Government, and the other man is there when his relinquishment is filed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman and I both know how it is done.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman from Illinois, of course, knows that the entryman makes oath that he intends to make a home on this land in his application.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They make thousands of oaths that do not amount to much out in the public-land country, I am sorry to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman opposed to the bill desire recognition. If not, the Clerk will read it for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That hereafter, for the period of two years following the passage of this act, on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal in which officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who have served not less than 90 days in the Army or Navy of the United States in the war with Germany and been honorably discharged therefrom shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead law, if duly qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "served," strike out the words "not less than 90 days."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 2, after the word "homestead," strike out the word "law" and insert the words "or desert-land laws."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, after the word "right," in line 4, insert the following new matter: "and as against preference rights conferred by existing laws or equitable claims subject to allowance and confirmation: Provided, That the rights and benefits conferred by this act shall not extend to any person who, having been drafted for military service under the provisions of the selective-service act, shall have refused to render military service or to wear the uniform of a soldier of the United States."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it to the section or to the amendment? The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. PARRISH. Line 10, page 2, after the word "military," insert "or naval," and then, after the word "of," in line 10, strike out "a soldier" and insert "such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARRISH: Page 2, line 10, after the word "military," insert the words "or naval"; after the word "of" strike out the words "a soldier" and insert the words "such service," so that amended the line will read: "shall have refused to render military or naval service or to wear the uniform of such service of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, that would make the amendment read that if anybody who has been drafted for military service "shall have refused to render military or naval service." I do not recall whether the draft extended to the Navy or not. Did the selective-draft law apply to the naval service?

Mr. PARRISH. It applied to all services.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The draft act did not apply to the Navy, did it?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No.

Mr. PARRISH. Yes; it applied to all of them. They assigned from the Army to the Navy, though.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it was voluntary.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I think in the latter part of the activity of recruiting our Army and Navy forces the men were drafted, and they shut down on accepting volunteers in the Navy, and men who were taken under the selective-service law were assigned by authorities to the Navy and to the other branches of the service; so that men who were drafted were, as a matter of fact, put into the naval service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Undoubtedly; but I think, as a matter of fact, they were given option as to going into the naval service. The law otherwise would put them in the military service. The object of the gentleman's amendment is "if they refuse to render military or naval service." They may not have refused to render naval and military service, but just refused to render military service.

Mr. PARRISH. Would the adding of the same words "or naval," after the word "military" in line 9, meet the objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I doubt whether there is any law providing for drafting for the naval service.

Mr. BLANTON. There was not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not remember, but somebody who was here at that time may. I was away most of the time. If there was not any, it is not desirable to put a question of that sort into a bill like this.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield the floor to the gentleman, or to the gentleman just as he desires.

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think the amendment of the gentleman from Texas would be better expressed if we would allow the language to remain as it is up to the words "of a soldier," in line 10, and strike out the words "a soldier of," and put in the words "such service," so that it would apply to all who were in the military service? My recollection is that the method of selective draft was confined, in the first instance, to those who were in the Army, and that the department had the privilege of taking from the draft certain persons and placing them in the naval service, but that the draft primarily was for selective Army service. But the whole thing was a military service, whether it was in the Army or in the Navy. I think if you retain the words "military service" and then strike out the word "soldier," because they may be held to include the Army part of the military service, the amendment would be better expressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to withdraw the first amendment I offered, or the part which inserts "or naval service"——

The CHAIRMAN. First, the gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment heretofore offered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARRISH. I offer it as to the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARRISH moves to amend, page 2, line 10, by striking out the words "a soldier" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman as now offered covers what he intends to correct, but it seems to me if we are going to change this phraseology the language ought to be amended by striking out, in line 8, the words "or military service," so that it would read, "having been drafted under the provisions of the selective-service act," and go on and say, "shall have refused to render service or to wear the uniform of such service of the United States." Because, as I recall it, the selective-service law was amended so as to include the Navy in the Military Establishment, so that it would apply to each branch of the service. Of course, the gentleman from Texas desires now to have it apply only to the service that was brought under the selective-service law. That law was later amended. I think if we strike out the words "military service," in line 8, it would improve the phraseology.

Mr. PARRISH. Would it not improve it still further by not striking out "military service," but simply striking out "military," so that it will read:

That the rights and benefits of this act shall not extend to any person who shall have refused to render service or to wear the uniform of service of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I think, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Illinois that their suggestions are good, and if I may have the permission to do so, I will ask that the amendment include also the striking out of the word "military" in line 8 and also the word "military" in lines 9 and 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to insert the word "such" before the word "service," in line 10, and strike out the words "a soldier" and insert the words "such service."

Mr. GARD. That is in the amendment.

Mr. PARRISH. Yes; that is already in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARRISH moves to amend, on page 2, line 8, by striking out the word "military," in lines 9 and 10, and in line 10 striking out the words "a soldier" and inserting in lieu thereof "such service," and inserting the word "such" after the word "render," in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment would not be in order now. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, when will my amendment be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order until later. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 0.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have just sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 2, line 1, after the word "honorably," insert the words "separated or"; also after the word "therefrom," in the same line and page, insert "or placed in the Regular Army or Naval Reserve."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, there has always been some question as to whether or not a former soldier who has been placed in the Regular Army Reserve is completely discharged from the service. It is sometimes referred to as "a separation" and sometimes it is referred to as "a discharge." In order to meet that question I have offered that amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is that the language of description, "The Regular Army or Naval Reserve"?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Regular Army Reserve—I am sure of that. We had that question up. The matter of the Naval Reserve was suggested by another gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the accepted description?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; "Regular Army Reserve" is the language of the committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suggested to the committee by the department?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I wish to amend line 8, page 1, after the word "than," by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting the word "ninety."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Page 1, line 8, after the word "than," strike out the word "sixty" and insert the word "ninety."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, this amendment should be adopted, for the reason that there may be an opening of public lands after the land is surveyed, or there may be Indian lands thrown open to entry or lands restored to entry, without the information becoming generally known. Soldiers living remote from the lands, although possibly in the same land district, may not be aware of the fact that the lands are open for entry; and, in order to be fair to those who reside some distance from the land, I think 30 days additional should be given in which to make entry.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Those conditions might prevail if you made it 90 days.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Perhaps so; but 60 days is a short time in which to advertise these openings. Frequently land is opened after a survey without notice being given, except merely a statement as a news item in the local newspaper; and in order to be fair to the soldiers living some distance from the land, it seems to me that 30 days additional should be given, so that they can have 90 days' notice in all.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "ninety" and inserting in lieu thereof "one hundred and eighty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN: Amend the amendment by striking out the word "ninety" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and eighty."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope I can get attention on this proposition. At first glance it seems to me that this might be allowing too much time, but I have come to this conclusion, that the remaining public lands that are worth entering at all ought to be solemnly dedicated for the use and benefit of our soldiers, and that is the principle that this House ought to act upon. Four million men are an ample number to acquire, one hundred times over, every foot of public land that is to be opened—that is, such land as a man can possibly make a living upon.

Now, this bill seems to be fair, because it is giving the soldier 60 days' time in which he shall have the preferential right to enter these lands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will notice that that is only for the period of two years.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and I will state to the gentleman that I have an amendment to offer to that, and my amendment will be to strike out these words, "for a period of two years," and leave it so that we establish a principle hereafter, not simply for two years. What is the argument for two years? What is the object of that? If it is right to give them a preferential right on lands opened in the next two years, it would be right to give that perpetually.

Four millions of men, three-fourths of whom have not homes! We have but little available public land left. Why not here in this House to-day, in this hour, recognize the principle that these lands, available and useful and suitable for homes, shall be solemnly given and set over to the soldier? To allow only 60 days is insignificant. As the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] well says, 60 days is too short. Of course, if my amendment does not carry, I will vote for his, providing for 90 days.

Now, gentlemen from the Western States need not be afraid that these lands will not be taken. There will be plenty of soldiers in this country to take all these lands, so that you do not need the public to come in and take these lands. I think we have the right to say to the soldier, "You shall have these lands," and I believe the public sentiment of this Nation would say that it is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman's amendment been approved by the Republican national committee, which is now in session?

Mr. MORGAN. I dislike to have the gentleman from Texas try to inject something partisan into this measure.

Mr. BLANTON. I am rather in favor of the gentleman's amendment. I feel inclined to vote for it.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the gentleman should put honest questions for the purpose of enlightening the House. The gentleman knows that his question was a partisan question, put for the purpose of introducing politics into this discussion. The gentleman knows he is not acting in good faith in putting such a queston as that to me. Why does he insist on going on here putting these questions? If he is a friend of the soldier, why not discuss this question honestly? Why be trying to raise a question of partisanship here?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MORGAN. I will not yield further for any such question as that.

I hope my amendment will be adopted. Let each side of this House here solemnly declare that these lands shall be dedicated to the noble purpose of providing homes for our soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I am now opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BENHAM. You just said you were in favor of it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Texas said he was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman said he was going to vote for it.

Mr. BLANTON. I was in favor of it, but the gentleman got so partisan that I can not stay with him.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have been with the gentleman from Oklahoma all along in his contention that something ought to be done for the soldier who has returned from France after doing honorable service to his flag and his country. What I said to the gentleman which he deemed to be partisan was strictly in line with the position that the gentleman himself has taken on the floor of this House and elsewhere during the present session of Congress. The gentleman has been urging Congress to do something for the soldier. Bill after bill has been before this committee proposing to do something for the returned soldier, with no definite action whatever taken by the committee, and here we are frittering away the time of the House on chicken-feed legislation and doing nothing of permanent advantage for the soldiers of this country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BLANTON. May I discuss the point of order with the Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. This measure proposes that for two years the soldiers of the country shall be given 60 days' preference right to file on and purchase certain public lands from the Government. The distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], having in his breast a feeling of interest in behalf of the soldier—something that I can not say a majority of his colleagues on that side of the House seemingly have—wants to do more for the soldier than the committee has offered to do. He has offered to give him this preference right not for 60 days, not for 90 days, as suggested by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH], but for 180 days, and at first, as long as he would let me, I agreed with him. I agree with the principle that something should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the gentleman is adhering to the rule, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the Chair will not take the discussion of the point of order out of my time. I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he agrees with the steering committee of his party that this little, measly bill that is now before the House is all that should be done for the soldiers of our country? Does he believe that the 4,000,000 soldiers whom he has referred to will be satisfied if this House merely passes a measure giving them 60 or 90 days' or even 180 days' preference right to file upon and purchase public lands? Does he believe that is going to satisfy the patriotic soldiers of this country? If he does not believe it, why does he not get in behind this committee? Why does he not get in behind the steering committee of his party and insist that they shall bring proper legislation before this House, and not let week after week and month after month fritter by with nothing done in their behalf? Is it not partisan politics influencing the majority that is responsible for such continued inaction?

Am I a partisan? I want to say if I am the gentleman ought to agree with me, and he ought to approve of the partisanship I show. Partisanship for whom? Partisanship for the soldiers of our country. I am sure the gentleman agrees with me on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I rise in opposition to the amendment. I believe it is entirely unnecessary and would be unfortunate. As a matter of fact, this amendment might hold every opening open for six months and largely destroy the whole value of it. When a tract of land is opened up for settlement it may be so small that it would only allow a comparatively few applications, and if you hold it up for six months, after many more applications have been already made than the amount of land will accommodate, that is not fair to those who are entitled to go on the land. The committee first thought of fixing this at 90 days. Then we said 30 days would probably be long enough, and we compromised on 60 days. I have no objection to 90 days, but what is the necessity of holding a drawing open for six months when it will all be taken up within less than 30 days.

Mr. MORGAN. Is not the gentleman sure of this fact, that there will be ample soldiers to take all of these little reservations as they come up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. The soldiers will take it all, and I am in favor of their getting it if they want it, and they will, and there will be none of these lands that will go to any others during the next two years if this bill passes.

Mr. MORGAN. Then if you say they will all be taken in 60 or 90 days——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They will probably all be taken in 10 days.

Mr. MORGAN. Then what harm can come to leave them open for 180 days? The land will all be gone anyway.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It holds the whole thing up. The drawing can not be closed. No one can learn where he stands.

Mr. MORGAN. When the land is gone there is nothing to hold up.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They could not do anything or learn who got the land until the six months are up.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; they can.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Nobody would know whether he is going to get any land or not until the preference period has expired. It holds everybody up for six months without knowing whether he is going to get anything or not. It would be a great hardship and detriment to make everybody wait six months.

Mr. MORGAN. When a man applies for a piece of land he goes on the land.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not if ten times as many apply to file as there are acres, and you would hold the whole thing open and unsettled. Everybody would have to wait six months before he learned whether he had drawn a piece of land or not.

Mr. MORGAN. Would you consent to give these lands entirely to the soldiers?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I do not think there is going to be a great many of these openings anyhow. I do not think this bill is going to furnish anything like as many homes for soldiers as I would like to see.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The objection the gentleman makes that it would hold the whole thing open for six months, it seems to me, is not well taken.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Suppose there is only enough land for 100 entries and there are 500 applicants within 30 days; they are not going to know whether their application is allowed until the end of the six-month period. That is unnecessarily holding them up for all that extra time.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I think the local land office would act on the applications as they came in. If the soldier should apply for land that was shown on the books to be open, it would be acted upon immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They would not make a report until after the filing period.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is true of all the lands embraced in the reservation, but the local office would act immediately on the applications as presented, provided it was a soldier to whom this right is given.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think that is the practice. As long as a drawing is held open it will be first for the soldiers to file on and then the civilians. There may be a piece of worthless ground——

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I have had a good deal of experience in the Land Office, and I will say that the practice would be that where provision was made for a certain class of applicants, when an individual of that class presented his application for land which was shown on the records to be open his application would be acted upon immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then there ought to be no limit at all.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I would like to see it all reserved for the soldiers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. So would I, and I should like to see other and much more important things done for the soldiers than this little bill. This is all right as far as it goes, but it does not go far. I was the author of the bill in the last Congress to provide homes for hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and I tried very hard to get it passed, tried to get a rule, and did everything I could do to obtain the consideration of it by this House, and I feel that this is, as the gentleman from Texas says, chicken-feed stuff. I think we ought to do something much more substantial for the soldiers, and do it now. We ought to at once take up the Lane reclamation bill and pass it as soon as possible.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman says he wants to reserve all the public land for the soldiers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no; I said all these little reservations, these small openings, that will be made during the next two years.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There are other people coming after these, and there are some other good people besides the soldiers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I was referring to these reservations or withdrawal openings of various kinds that will be made during the next two years.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman to say all the public lands forever.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no; not 300,000,000 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma to the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 3 ayes and 26 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Idaho) there were 15 ayes and 15 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was put, and only three Members having arisen, the demand for tellers was refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out all of line 3 after the word "hereafter," and in line 4, the following words: "passage of this act."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment I have offered is to strike out of the bill the words "for the period of two years following the passage of this act."

I do not know what this limit was put in for, but it does seem to me that we could well say that hereafter when little Indian reservations or forest reservations are opened to homestead entry or settlement, or opened under the public-land laws, that for a period of 60 days we shall allow the soldiers a preference right to enter these lands. I do not know why the rights of soldiers and the consideration to be given to soldiers should end in the short period of two years. If it is right to let them have this privilege for the next two years, which would go over the next—I won't say what I started to—but if it is right to give them preference right for two years it is right to give it to them as long as they live.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. Suppose we have another war, what would you do for the soldiers of that war, deprive them of the privilege?

Mr. MORGAN. No; but I would amend the law to give them the right.

Mr. MAYS. It might happen that the gentleman from Oklahoma would not be here at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORGAN. That might happen, and I do not know that the country would lose very much if I was not here. My amendments do not seem to pass anyway.

But in all seriousness I do not blame the Public Lands Committee, for in preparing a bill they know how their bills are criticized, as all other bills are, and they did not want to make it too liberal. It seems to me that in this case they have been too restrictive. I see no reason why we should not allow these little insignificant reservations of land that shall be open from time to time to be subject to the soldiers' preference right indefinitely.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Has the gentleman any legislative expression or intent to give more lands, or more valuable lands, to the soldiers than those embraced in this resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. The lands embraced in this resolution will constitute the best lands that there will be for entry and settlement, because they are in the reservations, the most available land, the most desirable. I think we ought to reserve or allow the Secretary of the Interior to reserve all of the public lands to give the soldiers an opportunity to take them. These lands are not very desirable at best. In order to establish this principle, that the remaining public lands of the Nation shall be dedicated to the great purpose of providing homes for our soldiers, I think we ought to cut out this restriction. I can see no reason at all for putting this period in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN) there were—ayes 7, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution No. 20, giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines preferred right of homestead entry, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 52, noes 3.

So the joint resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

BIRD RESERVATION IN SISKIYOU AND MODOC COUNTIES, CALIF.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands I call up the bill (H. R. 8440) to restore to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for a bird reservation in Siskiyou and Modoc Counties, Calif., and Klamath County, Oreg., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill H. R. 8440, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8440, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to determine and make public announcement of what lands in and around Little or Lower Klamath Lake, in Siskiyou County, Calif., and in Klamath County, Oreg., ceded to the United States by the State of California by the act entitled "An act authorizing the United States Government to lower the water levels of any or all of the following lakes: Lower or Little Klamath Lake, Tule or Rhett Lake, Goose Lake, and Clear Lake, situated in Siskiyou and Modoc Counties, and to use any part or all of the beds of said lakes for the storage of water in connection with the irrigation and reclamation operations conducted by the Reclamation Service of the United States; also ceding to the United States all right, title, interest, or claim of the State of California to any lands uncovered by the lowering of the water levels of any or all of said lakes not already disposed of by the State," and ceded to the United States by the State of Oregon by an act entitled "An act to authorize the utilization of Upper Klamath Lake, Lower or Little Klamath Lake, and Tule or Rhett Lake, situate in Klamath County, Oreg., and Goose Lake, situate in Lake County, Oreg., in connection with the irrigation and reclamation operations of the Reclamation Service of the United States, and to cede to the United States all the right, title, interest, and claim of the State of Oregon to any and all lands recovered by the lowering of the water levels or by the drainage of any or all of said lakes," will eventually be uncovered and opened to agricultural development by the lowering of the water level of said lake. Title to all said lands can be acquired by homestead entry under the general homestead laws and the provisions of this act and not otherwise: Provided, That all said lands shall forever be and remain subject to the right of the United States (a) to overflow the same or any part thereof for the purposes of irrigation by such systems of reservoirs and drainage and diking as now actually exist or may be hereafter constructed in Siskiyou County, Calif., and Klamath County, Oreg., and (b) to drain the water therefrom. All patents issued for the said lands shall expressly reserve to the United States such right of overflow and drainage.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall also determine and make public announcement of the proportionate part of the sum of $283,225, heretofore expended from the reclamation fund in connection with the Klamath project, Oregon-California, that in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior each acre of the said land should be assessed, and the proportionate part that each acre of privately owned land, similarly situated to the said lands hereby affected, should be assessed, to return to said reclamation fund in all the said sum of $283,225.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause said lands to be surveyed and opened to entry under the general homestead laws and the provisions of this act: Provided, That none of said lands shall be opened to entry until the Secretary of the Interior shall have first made arrangement with the owners of lands in private ownership, similarly situated to the lands hereby affected, for the payment into the reclamation fund of the proportionate part of the sum of $283,225, determined and apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior against said privately owned lands as provided in section 2.

SEC. 4. That in addition to all payments required by the general homestead laws there shall be paid by homestead entrymen the amount per acre assessed as provided in section 2 of this act. Said payment shall be made in annual installments of $1 per acre, except the last installment, which may be a fraction of a dollar: Provided, That the whole or any part of the amount so assessed may be paid by the entryman in a shorter period if he so elects. The first installment shall be paid at the time homestead application is filed and subsequent installments shall be due and payable on December 1 of each calendar year thereafter until the entire sum so assessed and apportioned against the lands is paid, and patent shall not issue for any of said lands until the sum so appropriated against said lands shall have been fully paid. Failure to pay any installment when due shall render the entry subject to cancellation, with a forfeiture of all moneys paid. All assessments shall draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from their due date until paid. All moneys paid on account of such assessments shall, without diminution of any kind whatsoever, be covered into the reclamation fund.

SEC. 5. That those who served with the military or naval forces of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and her allies and have been honorably separated or discharged therefrom or placed in the Regular Army Reserve shall have preference and prior right to file upon and enter said lands under the homestead laws and the provisions of this act for a period of six months following the time said lands are opened to entry. That in opening said lands for homestead entry the Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the disposition thereof to the said soldiers, sailors, and marines, by drawing, under general rules and regulations to be promulgated by him.

SEC. 6. That no rights to make entry shall attach by reason of settlement or squatting upon any of the lands hereby restored before the hour on which such lands shall be subject to homestead entry at the land office, and until said lands are opened for settlement and entry as herein provided no person shall enter upon and occupy the same, and any person violating this provision shall never be permitted to enter any of said lands.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall determine which of the lands now within the boundaries of the Klamath Lake Bird Reserve are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which for the purpose of said reservation, and shall open to homestead entry those lands which are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes: Provided, That the shore line of the lake, including the smallest legal subdivision of land adjoining the flow line, shall remain in the possession of the United States, but access may be provided to the lake for such canals as may be necessary for irrigation, drainage, and domestic water supply.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would ask how much time the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] desires in general debate?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we need take any time. I think we can discuss the matter under the five-minute rule. The matters are so plain and clear that I believe it is not necessary to take time in general debate unless some one desires some particular information.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from California what they are going to do with all of the birds that have been on this land?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, they will be on the lake and other lands. The land to be restored from the bird reservation comprises about 55,000 acres of agricultural land—the best in the world—upon which men can go and immediately commence to make a living. That is the character of the land, and that is the purpose of opening it—to the end that the soldiers might go there and make homes.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Oregon yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask a question about section 5, which gives six months' preference to those who serve in the military and naval forces. Section 6 provides that no rights to make entry shall attach by reason of settlement or squatting upon any of the lands restored before the hour at which such lands shall be subject to homestead entry at the Land Office. Would that interfere with the six months' period of the soldiers?

Mr. SINNOTT. The priority merely relates to the right to file upon and enter.

Mr. BEE. And not the settlement?

Mr. SINNOTT. They have priority to file, and no one has any right to squat or settle on the land and thereby obtain any preferential rights over the soldier or sailor.

Mr. BEE. Then there would be no danger in the soldiers being deprived of their rights by reason of section 6?

Mr. SINNOTT. Section 6 just gives them additional protection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What has become in this bill of the recommendation of Secretary Lane as evidenced by his letter of March 4, 1918, that there should be some privilege afforded members of the Siskiyou Homesteaders' Association, as originally embraced in section 5 of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. The original bill contained a clause for preference rights to members of that association, but the Secretary first reported adversely on that. Afterwards he modified his views, and that is the matter that has carried this bill along for two or three years.

But finally the preference right provision of members of this Homesteaders' Association was eliminated from the bill, and the bill was reported by the committee, but there has been very strong opposition to the preference-right feature to the members of this Siskiyou Homesteaders' Association, so that provision was eliminated from the bill and the preference right given to the soldiers.

Mr. GARD. The last evidence I see is the letter of the Secretary of date of March 14, 1918, in which he suggests an amendment to the bill which would give to the members of the Siskiyou Homesteaders' Association a preferential right under certain conditions to make application for entry on these lands because of their previous occupation and services in securing riparian rights and generally developing this land. Now, section 5 limits the privilege to those who are in the military and naval forces of the United States, and it eliminates the Homesteaders' Association entirely.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; the association was entirely eliminated; that has been a controverted point in the bill, and that preference-right feature is what has heretofore held back the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARD. What is the gentleman's idea about that. Should or should not these men who have been on the land or near the land, who have developed, who have given of their services in seeing that more land is added and riparian rights were secured—should they not have the privilege of entry?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, of course that takes us into the controverted domain. It has been heretofore contended that there were no settlers or homesteaders upon this land entitled to a preference right. I do not care to go into that at length. The people in my State interested in this matter were strongly opposed to any preferential right, and they dispute all these allegations concerning the settlers, but I do not care to go into that matter.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman's State is not part of the Siskiyou reservation, is it?

Mr. RAKER. Part of the lands are on each side of the line.

Mr. SINNOTT. Seven thousand acres of these lands are in Oregon and 27,000 acres in California, and some Oregonians are members of the Suskiyou Homesteaders' Association.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Ohio overlooked the last report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is on August 29, page 3, of the report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. SINNOTT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this under general debate or under the five-minute rule, or where are we at?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is proceeding, and the gentleman from Oregon has been recognized for one hour.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman with regard to this land. Is it at the present time in condition of a swamp, or has some drainage taken place there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Some drainage has taken place there, but there is considerable swamp land. The water is gradually drying up by evaporation and more land is being recovered from time to time.

Mr. HICKS. Now, if some of the land is still in a swampy condition, how is it contemplated the land is to be drained; how is that work to be done?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is to be drained by evaporation.

Mr. HICKS. Not by the work of man at all?

Mr. SINNOTT. Only indirectly at the present time.

Mr. HICKS. Is there any scheme contemplated by which the State of Oregon and the State of California shall drain these lands?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; the land is draining itself by evaporation. I will state to the gentleman that this 54,000 acres of lake and swamp are caused by the overflow waters of the Klamath River running through a side channel. That channel has been closed with gates, so that the waters of the Klamath River no longer have access to this lake and swamp. The waters of the Klamath River supply the waters for the swamp. The access of those waters is closed, so that the water is evaporating from year to year. It possibly will be several years before the water is entirely evaporated.

Mr. HICKS. My experience is in that part of the West it rains about every day, and it will take some time to evaporate the water, I should judge.

Mr. SINNOTT. This is east of the mountains, not west of the mountains, and this is a more or less arid section. I suppose the rainfall there is not over 12 or 14 inches.

Mr. RAKER. Something like that.

Mr. SINNOTT. But in a few years the swamp will be entirely evaporated and the land reclaimed.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. For the purpose of illuminating the RECORD, I would like to inquire what sort of birds and how many birds was this land originally intended for; what kind of birds?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, only part of the land there belongs within the bird reserve, but ducks and geese and pelicans and all sorts of waterfowl congregate there upon the marshes.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will yield.

Mr. BEE. I notice in section 2, page 3, that the proportionate part of some $283,000 is referred to, and that section 3 provides that the land shall not be open for entry until the Secretary of the Interior shall have first made arrangement with the owners of land in private ownership, similarly situated to the lands hereby affected, for the payment into the reclamation fund of the proportionate part of $283,225. I would like to ask the gentleman for information how will the Secretary of the Interior be able to force those owning lands privately to contribute their proportionate share of this fund, and how long will that hang up the opening up of the land?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will state to the gentleman that matter has all been arranged. The owners of the private land have all made their partial payment.

Some two years ago they paid $23,500 for the purpose of closing the gates in the straits of the Klamath River, which supplied the water to the swamp.

Mr. BEE. It will not delay the opening of the land, then?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no; that has already been arranged for. They paid the $23,500 then; then they were obligated to make a partial payment in December, 1918, of something over $2,000; to be exact $2,777.78. That has been paid. Then they were to pay some thing over $2,000, or $2,777.78, the 1st of this December, and, of course, they have not the report in the department as to whether or not that payment was made. I called up the Reclamation Service over the phone, and they assume that the payment has been made, because if it had not been made they would have been notified.

Mr. BEE. The point I wanted to inquire especially about was if it will not delay the opening of these lands by reason of having to make arrangements with the owners?

Mr. SINNOTT. That has already been negotiated.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman intend before we start reading this bill to make some little statement of its purposes and objects and the pressing necessity for its passage at this particular time?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will be glad to answer any questions or to make any explanation.

Mr. WALSH. Then I would like to ask the gentleman what is the need of this legislation at this particular time? Why can it not wait or be dispensed with entirely?

Mr. SINNOTT. The sooner this legislation is passed the sooner this land will get under cultivation, and the Government will also be sooner repaid an investment of something like $283,225 heretofore expended upon these lands, and $179,327 of that investment will be repaid under the provisions of this bill and $104,898.15 will be repaid by the owners of private lands. They have already paid the $23,500 and their annual payments since 1917 for that purpose.

I will state to the gentleman that this Klamath marsh in Oregon and California, about 27,000 acres in each State, was originally intended to be reclaimed under the Klamath-California-Oregon project, but after the work was inaugurated these 57,000 acres were eliminated from the California-Oregon-Klamath irrigation project, but the Reclamation Service had made an expenditure of $283,225, which was charged up against the lands afterwards eliminated from the irrigation project, and if this bill accomplishes its object this entire $283,225 will be repaid to the Government.

Mr. WALSH. By whom?

Mr. SINNOTT. It will be repaid by the settlers, those who enter upon this land under the provisions of this act, and also the owners of the privately owned lands in Oregon. There are some 20,000 acres now privately owned in Oregon of this land in question.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield.

Mr. LAYTON. If I understand the situation, the gentleman from Oregon apprehends that in the course of time these lands are going to become so dry that the waterfowl will be dried out of house and home?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; that is not true. The bill specifically protects the waterfowl and the bird reserve. That will not be destroyed. There is a provision in the bill for the protection of the bird reserve.

Mr. LAYTON. What you are disposing of then is the land that gradually dries out?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; the land outside of the bird reserve.

Mr. LAYTON. As fast as it dries out?

Mr. SINNOTT. As fast as it dries out.

Mr. LAYTON. Down to the water line?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to make an inquiry, not that it has any bearing on this bill, but for the purpose of illuminating the RECORD, as my friend from Delaware says. What is this made land for? To what purpose will it be put if it is drained—to raising apples, wheat, or what?

Mr. SINNOTT. This land will be put into clover, timothy, alfalfa, and other forage crops. Some grain can be raised there. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is probably more familiar with that matter than I am.

Mr. RAKER. On the surrounding land, and land in like conditions, that have been reclaimed in the last five years, they raise clover, timothy, wheat, barley, potatoes, cabbage, and all products that that country produces in that climate successfully, and to a very large advantage.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will it produce raisins?

Mr. HICKS. May I ask the gentleman if they produce raisins or grapes of any kind? My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], I see, is interested in that answer.

Mr. RAKER. I see you want a frank answer. It is a little too high. It is in the mountains, and the elevation is too high for raisins. We have sufficient lands in the valley on which to raise raisins.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts asks the question I wish to say I do not think the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has given the gentleman from Massachusetts sufficient answer as to why it is necessary to pass this bill. If you would permit me, I would further suggest that we have got nothing else to do from now until Christmas, so why not pass this bill?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Is that the only reason?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am giving a further reason why it is necessary to pass it.

Mr. LITTLE. Besides that, we have got to give the Democrats a little opportunity to get a little advantage by criticizing it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Do you think it ought to be criticized?

Mr. LITTLE. Possibly. Go to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Kansas is far afield from anything I have said. Nothing I have said or asked should lead to such a remark from him. I think we should not only be doing something here but we ought to have the appearance of doing something, and to-day is public-lands day, and I think it is necessary for us to pass some legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I think we have done a good deal. We have been able to secure the attendance and interest of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina. It is quite an advantage to have the gentleman from North Carolina with us. It is seldom we have him with us unless his committee has something to report.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts a little while ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], who I trust is still in favor of this bill, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], how the character of this program came to be changed when this land was ceded for a bird reservation? How did the demand arise to have this land withdrawn? What was it that gave rise to this decision of the Department of the Interior, or the General Land Office, or whoever it was that said that the only way in which this could be accomplished was by an act of Congress?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, the land was not ceded for a bird reservation; the land was ceded to the General Government, so that the General Government might either raise or lower the level of these lakes, use them for reservoirs or irrigation purposes, or drain them, in order to secure more land for utilization under the reclamation act. Then the bird reserve was afterwards imposed upon a part of this land.

What the gentleman has in mind, no doubt, is the controversy which came up in California between the General Government and the State of California as to whether or not a certain part of this land was ceded in the act of cession by that State. Mr. Vogelsang, of the Interior Department, in a decision held that they were ceded, but I believe that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is more familiar with that feature of it than I am.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I would like the gentleman from California to answer, if the gentleman from Oregon will yield to him.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I will answer if I can.

Mr. WALSH. My inquiry was, What arose out there with respect to those lands where this reserve is located that apparently, from the record here, suddenly changed the whole character of this project? What gave rise to this demand that these lands, which in 1908 were set apart for a bird reservation, should be thrown open and made the object of further legislation, so that the scramble for possession could be set in motion? What was it? Was it the controversy that arose as to the result of the decision of Mr. Vogelsang, Acting Secretary, or was it some local controversy out there in the State?

Mr. RAKER. I think I can in a few words elucidate the entire situation.

Mr. WALSH. Then I will not finish my question—if the gentleman can do that.

Mr. RAKER. The local demands for these lands, which are valuable for agricultural purposes, upon which the people were entering and trying to make settlements, were so urgent that the department held that to be illegal, because these were withdrawn from entry, and that brought about the legislation. On these lands last year and this year there grew from 10,000 to 20,000 tons of hay. A good deal of it was burned up and went to waste, because there was nobody who could go in there and take charge of it.

The land was withdrawn originally for reclamation purposes. The department spent this $228,000 for the purpose, and after some investigation they determined that they could not proceed with the project, and they eliminated these particular lands and held them so that they could not be filed upon. The Department of the Interior requested the President to declare it a bird reserve because it was public land. It was declared a bird reserve. Since that time there have been about three or four thousand acres of the land eliminated from the bird reserve. This bill allows it to be homesteaded, and in order that it might be disposed of properly the homesteaders, in addition, are required to pay back to the Government the amount of money that has been expended in the development of the land. The private individuals referred to by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] have agreed to pay $104,000. They have obligated themselves to do so, and they have already paid a large amount.

The Reclamation Service, while it held the land, in its order required the railroad, which was crossing the lower and west part of the land, to build an embankment all across the land, which was swampy except where the river entered upon the land, and all the Government had to do was to put gates in this river, and this entire land is reclaimed.

Mr. WALSH. By putting gates in the river?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. That will prevent the water from backing up from the river, which flows on the lower side of the dam, thereby filling up this large territory of some 55,000 acres of land.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether or not this legislation is in effect a determination of this controversy which arose in the manner stated and on the side of the State of California?

Mr. RAKER. No. The State of California and those applicants under it made no pretense—there were no applications made until the question came up some four years ago—that these people were trying to obtain this land. There have been applications by all parties trying to obtain this land, but they were turned down, because the filings were illegal for the reason as stated, the land being withdrawn and placed in this bird reserve. That is the reason for the provision of section 6, that anyone who enters upon the land and tries to hold it is doing so illegally, and their action is void.

Since the war the policy of Congress has been changed, and the view was that, notwithstanding the money and expense and trouble that these other people have gone to, these lands should be turned over to the soldiers who served this country. There are plenty of them in the country who are ready and willing and desirous now to enter upon this land. It is very valuable. I can say from personal observation that two years ago there was not less than 10,000 tons of hay destroyed, and thousands of head of cattle died that winter that could have been saved if the farmers had been permitted to go on that land and use it.

Mr. WALSH. What has become of the birds?

Mr. RAKER. The birds that were on this land are still there. The lake is still preserved, and there is still a border around the lake for all the ducks and geese that land there. The pelicans and geese and blue cranes, and so forth, will protect themselves. They will still be protected.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has answered the question generally. I would like to ask him now, assuming that that demand arose for the reasons he stated, and perhaps for some other reasons, does he think that this legislation accomplishes what is desired and that the rights and interests of the Federal Government are adequately protected?

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that to my mind this is one of the best bills for the protection of the Government that has been passed by Congress since I have been here, because in addition to giving to these men the right to file upon the land as a homestead it requires a repayment to the Government of the $285,000 that has been expended in the development of the land, to the end that the Government shall not lose a dollar.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this bill contains any protective reservation of the mineral rights in this land to the Government?

Mr. WALSH. I do not see any such reservation.

Mr. RAKER. There is a general law covering that.

Mr. WALSH. I was trying to get an assurance from the gentleman from California.

Mr. GARD. There is no such protection in the bill, and I think it should be in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. The general legislation on the statute books as to minerals is already provided for.

Mr. GARD. It is not provided for in this bill.

Mr. RAKER. It is in the general law.

Mr. WALSH. That would not apply to this legislation.

Mr. RAKER. If you take up public lands you take them up subject to the mineral-land provision.

Mr. WALSH. Now, will the gentleman state his view as to who the parties will be who will pay back this $285,000?

Mr. RAKER. In the first instance there is $104,000 to be paid back by the people on the Oregon side who have already contracted to pay it. They have paid now a part, I imagine about $60,000, already, and are continuing the payment. The rest of the $285,000 will be paid back by those who file upon the remaining Government land.

Mr. WALSH. How did these people come to enter into any such contract?

Mr. RAKER. The Oregon people?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gates would not have been closed. It would have remained a swamp. It would have remained unused land, and every year in the spring, when the Klamath River rises, the water backs up and covers this entire country from a foot to two and a half feet deep. Therefore the land, so far as living on it is concerned, is useless.

Mr. WALSH. How did they come to enter into this contract?

Mr. RAKER. With the general understanding that this legislation would be enacted, to the end that they would all be protected.

Mr. WALSH. This legislation was pending in the last Congress and in the Congress before, if I mistake not?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And this contract was entered into prior to the legislation being introduced?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Are they still to go on under that contract?

Mr. RAKER. They are.

Mr. WALSH. So that if this legislation does not pass, this reimbursement will still continue just the same under the contract they have entered into?

Mr. RAKER. To the extent of $104,000 by those who have entered into the contract. The Government clearly will carry out its purpose to the end that all of this land may pay its proportionate burden according to the acreage—proportionate to the whole expense that it costs to develop it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. May I ask the gentleman from California what this land is worth an acre that these people are going to pay the Government to procure?

Mr. RAKER. They will pay the Government the proportion that the number of acres they take bears to the remaining unpaid portion of the $285,000, which would be about $145,000.

Mr. GALLIVAN. How much an acre?

Mr. RAKER. It will amount to about $5 an acre.

Mr. GALLIVAN. About $5 an acre?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I wanted to get that into the RECORD.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The Chair is not certain whether the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] yielded the floor and the gentleman from Massachusetts took it, or whether the gentleman from Oregon yielded to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SINNOTT. I yielded to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LITTLE. They both yielded to me for a question, anyway. The gentleman from Oregon had the floor, and I understood that he yielded to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LITTLE. What I want to inquire is if there are any riparian rights, or accretions, or new lands formed by recession, which are interfered with here?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; these are public lands.

Mr. LITTLE. Somebody said there were settlers immediately adjoining these lands.

Mr. RAKER. On the Oregon side adjoining the public lands in Oregon; and the land in California is the same character of land. It was disposed of differently in Oregon and in California. There are in the neighborhood of 15,000 acres.

Mr. LITTLE. There are a lot of people living there?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Have they, by accretion or recession or formation of new lands, obtained any legal rights to the land involved herein?

Mr. RAKER. Only by virtue of this contract.

Mr. LITTLE. Anybody who owns land next to accreted land is liable to have a right in that land.

Mr. RAKER. There is no land involved in this except the public land, which is above the accretions or riparian rights.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not quite get you. This land is to be thrown open for settlement?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. There are some settlers on the land adjoining it, are there not?

Mr. RAKER. But they are on the outside.

Mr. LITTLE. Of course, they are on the outside. They could not be on the inside.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, have these men, by accretion or by formation of new land or by recession of the waters, acquired any rights or claims that might be interfered with by this legislation?

Mr. RAKER. No; I say they have not; if it were, they have the contract——

Mr. LITTLE. The contract has nothing to do with the accretions.

Mr. RAKER. I say if there are any the Department of the Interior have their waiver on file, and they have been compensated for it.

Mr. LITTLE. They have waived their accretions?

Mr. RAKER. They have waived their accretion and all claims. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois for one hour.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall distinctly the facts in reference to this measure which are not easily ascertained from reading the report. If I remember correctly, I have been over the bill several times in different Congresses, or a bill along this line. I did not hear all of the explanation made by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], in whose district these lands, or a part of them, are, I believe. The gentleman from Oregon says that a part of them are in Oregon and a part in California. That makes a pretty good combination between California and Oregon and a pretty good combination on the floor of the House between the gentleman from Oregon and the gentleman from California, both being distinguished gentlemen, especially familiar with public-land questions, and both desirous of protecting the rights of settlers who want to come into their States. Sometimes I fear they are more anxious to protect the rights of settlers who want to come into their States than they are of the birds who may want to pass on to some other place.

This was and is a bird reserve. It is proposed to lower the level of the water in the lakes, I believe. I do not know whether this bill does that or whether it is done by the Government in some other way—and to open to settlement the public lands which will be left when the lakes are lowered.

It is desirable always to have good public lands tilled. It is also desirable, if practicable, to give the birds some chance. I can remember easy enough—I am not so old as I hope I will be some day—but I can remember when I saw birds by the millions, I think with no exaggeration, certainly many, many thousands, of ducks at one time floating on the waters on my father's farm. There are no ducks there now and no place for the ducks to rest.

Somewhere in the passage between the North and South there must be places where these birds can have an opportunity to rest, if they are to be preserved at all.

Of course, I know they always say, as they say in this report, that this will not affect the rights of the birds. The lakes are still to be there. I would like to know how much, if any, the size of these lakes is to be reduced through the operations that are to be carried on there.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The permanent banks of the lakes will not be interfered with at all; and, in addition to that, there will be a fractional section around the permanent shores of the lake reserved.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman this: There is an act of the Legislature of California——

Mr. RAKER. And of Oregon also.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Authorizing the United States Government to lower the water level of any or all of the following lakes. Was that the purpose of the act?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is it the intention of the Government of the United States to do this, or to permit anybody else to do it?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then that does lower the level of the water in the lakes and reduces the boundary lines?

Mr. RAKER. It does and it does not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is too quick for me—"it does and it does not."

Mr. RAKER. Because by the rise of water in the river the entire country that is covered by this water is known as the lake, and it rises from a foot to three feet and a half. As the summer advances, through July, August, and September, the water recedes and leaves these permanent bodies of water there, and they are not affected.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The permanent body of water that is left in September after a dry summer is not the size of the lake. There are lots of lakes throughout the country that have no water in them at times, and there are lots of rivers in California that have no water in them in September while they are good sized rivers in the spring.

Mr. RAKER. The land involved is 100,000 acres covered with water, and there is remaining 55,000 acres which is now covered with hay, but the hay could not be cut on it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why? Do not they have wild rice there, or is that what they do have?

Mr. RAKER. Not yet.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Do not they have anything on the ground that is covered with a foot or two of water in the spring of the year?

Mr. RAKER. Yes, grass, but no rice.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Wild rice would grow in most places of that sort. It may be that they do not have wild rice in California, but it would be strange if they do not, and it would be strange if hay of any value grew there if covered with water to any extent.

Mr. RAKER. It does; of exceedingly high value. Some of it has tule in it, but there is hay there of exceedingly good quality, and there is fine pasture each year.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is this $283,225? Was that money that the Government of the United States expended uselessly?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I do not think so. The Government expended the $283,000 in surveys and estimates and also in an experiment station which it had there in handling this tract of land for the purpose of opening it to settlement.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman is not stating all of the purposes for which it was expended.

Mr. RAKER. Not all.

Mr. SINNOTT. Of course, it was expended in enlarging ditches and canals so that this land might hereafter be irrigated, and also in supplying certain water rights and in building another canal to supply a man with water who was taking water out of the lake.

Mr. RAKER. I am glad the gentleman from Oregon has called my attention to that. In other words, what was known as the Van Brimmer people, living on this tract——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, I do not care about that. I want to know what they spent the money for.

Mr. RAKER. They had a water right, and to settle with them so that the lake could be lowered the Government furnished them with so much money and gave them a water right coming out of the canal from another source.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And that is what the Government of the United States did?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under what authority?

Mr. RAKER. The reclamation act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How much did they pay for that?

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is about $24,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How was the rest of the money expended?

Mr. SINNOTT. The itemized account is on page 23 of the report.

Mr. RAKER. I was answering from recollection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How was it expended? I have read the report.

Mr. RAKER. For engineering, some $15,000, and they had a storage works, $437, and the main canal, of which the gentleman from Oregon speaks, building the canal north, and about 20 miles farther to the end, so that they could bring that water from the storage at another place, so that the Van Brimmer people could get their water on the land; and the Van Brimmer people waived their right to draw the water from this lake, which was a riparian right, and a prior right to the Government's right, and the lake never could have been lowered unless they did that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Practically all of it is to be abandoned under this bill?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did not the Government intend to put a reclamation project on this land?

Mr. RAKER. Where the railroad crossing is at what is known as Keno Falls, the Government intended to lower the falls, and that would have drained all of this land; and, in addition to that, they expected to develop 100,000 horsepower of energy below the Keno Falls.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I may be mistaken, but when I read the report I did not see how these lands had been benefited by the expenditure of this very large sum of money.

Mr. RAKER. As a matter of fact, by placing these gates at the railroad crossings in the river that land can be drained; every foot of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, but the gates have not been placed there.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; they have. They have been maintained there for the last three years.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Out of this money?

Mr. RAKER. Supervision, and so forth; yes. That is part of the handling of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does that pay for the gates and everything?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, the gates are not very expensive. I think it paid for the gates. That is my recollection. The gates are just lift-and-drop gates, and the work was done by the railroad company—the building of the bridge and the dam where it crosses the river.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is quite particular in his statements, and doubtless to one who is better informed they would be very informing, but they have not meant very much to me as yet. Here it is proposed to throw certain lands open to public settlement now in a reservation. It appears that the Government has expended nearly $300,000 for some purpose, a lot of different purposes. As I understand it, it is proposed now to charge that cost, or at least a portion of it, to these lands when they are thrown open to public settlement.

Mr. RAKER. That is it; yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I fail to see how the lands have been benefited by the expenditure of this money. I may be wrong, but it did look to me as though the Reclamation Service had wantonly and recklessly expended a considerable sum of money without getting any benefit from it, and that they now propose, because there is some land that might be considered available, to load that cost upon that land.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I may be mistaken, but nobody has contradicted me as yet.

Mr. RAKER. May I answer that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The Reclamation Service, I am satisfied, have done that in this instance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What have they done?

Mr. SINNOTT. Let the gentleman read the explanation of the Reclamation Service on page 23 of the report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, the gentleman need not read from the report. I have read the report.

Mr. RAKER. I want to make a statement. The department put an experimental station in there some 8 or 10 years ago. They put a young man in there to do the work. The young man made a failure, and on his report the department thought it was all right. The farmers came into that country some two or three years later, and they developed not only from actual experience on the adjoining land, but on similar land in Oregon, that this is as fine productive land as there is in the State of Oregon or in the State of California.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, that carries out what I said. The Reclamation Service spent $16,000 and more trying to teach some young man how to farm when he did not know anything about it and squandered $16,000 to prove what was not true, as the gentleman says, that the land could not be used for farming purposes. If that was not a reckless and wanton waste of money, I do not know any that can be.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, having done that, they want to make the fellows who can make it successful pay for it. Is not that right?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is it, then?

Mr. RAKER. These people who live there are willing to file on the land——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, I suppose the land is worth $50 or $100 an acre.

Mr. RAKER. It is pretty valuable land.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Possibly worth more than that. Of course, they are willing to file on it if it is given to them.

Mr. RAKER. But the gentleman must——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I want to know whether that is the theory under which it is proceeding.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman must remember that in all that country there were only a few places 12 years ago, and the Reclamation Service has gone there and made veritable gardens out of adjoining lands. There is Tule Lake east of them, and they have gone to work and reclaimed the land, and some of it is as fine farming land as you ever saw in your life, in the bed of that lake, which has been reclaimed by keeping the water from running into the lake.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Was not the Irrigation Service designed to irrigate public lands more than to drain a lake?

Mr. RAKER. That is what they have done. By turning off the river that ran into the lake and using it for irrigation they have done that. It ran into the lake and stayed there, and they have turned the river out of the lake and it has raised every year until about 10,000 acres of farm land have been reclaimed. I saw there a year and a half ago grain standing 4 or 5 feet high, as fine wheat as you ever saw in your life. On Tule Lake east of this neighborhood about 5,000 acres of fine farm land——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What kind of fertilizer do they use?

Mr. RAKER. They do not need any.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They do not put any potash on it? I do not ask if they needed any.

Mr. RAKER. No; it is rich enough without it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I doubt if you find any lake rich without putting potash on it——

Mr. RAKER. And there is the same condition south of that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And I doubt whether it is the case out there.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call attention to this: South of this is another place where they drained 20,000 acres of swamp land on which from 4½ to 5½ tons of timothy a year is raised.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very likely.

Mr. RAKER. Just by turning the water off and by irrigating to the extent necessary to cultivate it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I am still very cloudy in my mind.

Mr. RAKER. I know the Reclamation Service did what they could to assist in the development, and by their knowledge and by their assistance of every kind, and by their constant work they have brought people in there, and finally they were able to develop the land, and if it was given the opportunity they will develop this in the same way. That assistance has given them the benefit of the railroad which would never have been built except for the Reclamation Service. You see they built a railroad there 2½ miles long——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Who?

Mr. RAKER. The railroad company, and paid for it themselves.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman said, "You see."

Mr. RAKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That railroad runs on northwest to Klamath Falls across this marsh about 2½ miles long. They have built a solid embankment that is a dam, and where the river comes in they have these gates there, just what the Reclamation Service wanted to put in, and by the spending of this money they reclaimed land for $5 and $6 an acre, whereas under ordinary conditions it would cost from $25 to $27 an acre to reclaim.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Apparently most of the work was done by the railroad company, and most of the money was spent by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. RAKER. The railroad was built by private capital, and they could not have crossed the land without the consent of the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The $300,000 is really charged for giving consent; somebody had to do some work.

Mr. RAKER. No, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am waiting if somebody can explain how this $300,000 expended by the Reclamation Service has been any benefit to this land against which it is proposed now to make a charge for the expenditure.

Mr. RAKER. Well, the only thing I can say is that without this work and without this labor this land would be unused, there would be no gates put in there, there would be no entrymen there, there would be no handling of it at all, and it would be a water waste to-day. To-day if these people expend about $5 an acre they will get title to this land, and it is to be reclaimed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would be the case if this other money had not been spent, would it not?

Mr. RAKER. I do not see how it could have been. The gentleman must remember this. In all of these projects, where there is an expenditure, they try to apportion it so as to make the man who is benefited bear his proportionate part of the general expense.

Now, these Oregon people who own their land and that receive title from the State of Oregon, some 15,000 acres, realized the benefit of it, and came in and entered into a contract with the Reclamation Service to pay back $104,000 that the Reclamation Service had expended in the examination, which is specified in the report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This land was reserved at the time these expenditures were made?

Mr. RAKER. It was, for reclamation purposes and not for a bird reserve. The bird reserve was only an afterclap to this service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. When was the bird reserve made? When was this nearly $300,000 expended?

Mr. RAKER. It has been running along for some 12 years. The greater part of it was spent about 8 years ago on the buying of the Adams Canal and the other ditches specified there, the lower Klamath and lake pumping plant. The Adams Canal is a canal that is 30 miles from there, that takes the water east, but it drains the whole valley from Merrill to Klamath Falls, Oreg., and irrigates the land in there to the extent of nearly 150,000 acres.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I have no doubt it is my own fault in not following the gentleman from California. I think at one time years ago I had this pretty clearly in my head, but it has not been recalled to me yet by anything I have heard. I dare say, after all the discussion on this subject this afternoon—and there has been considerable—that outside of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] and possibly one or two other members of the Committee on Public Lands no one here who has heard the discussion has the slightest conception of what is to be done or what has been done.

Mr. RAKER. Let me state this to the gentleman in response to that that on pages 22 and 23 of the report is an itemized account from the Reclamation Service and the reason they expended that money.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I read that long ago, but that gives no information.

Mr. RAKER. It would have taken 20 pages to have made it in detail.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would have taken about two pages to really state the case, and it has not been done.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has the gentleman from Illinois read the opinion of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have read all this report. I will not undertake to say that I remember all that is in it, because I do not. I know they reported favorably upon this bill. But while I have a great deal of respect for the opinion of the Interior Department and a great deal of respect for the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], I would hate to be the Assistant Secretary of the Interior and have the gentleman from California want me to report one way and decide I was going to report the other way, because he never would let up.

Mr. RAKER. May I call the gentleman's attention to this? He asked me a question just a moment ago that I could not answer. The bird reserve was created by Executive order of September 8, 1908, and was amended by Executive order on May 15, 1915.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I thought it was quite awhile ago.

Mr. RAKER. It was; and it was made for the purpose of avoiding any question of the disposition of the land.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman may be right about that. There was a good deal of agitation about that time in the country in favor of preserving the birds. I believe a very distinguished man by the name of Roosevelt was President at that time.

Mr. RAKER. I am for the protecting of birds.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He was for bird reserves. He created more bird reserves than anybody else. I do not know that anybody has ever created any except what he created. He created a great many, and he never missed a chance, and he did a great deal of good that way. Now that he is not here we propose to repeal those reservations.

Mr. RAKER. I am for the bird reserve.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know.

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. We have had this up with every department and have gone into it fully, and a personal examination of this land will show that putting this land into farms will do more to protect that bird reserve than anything else that can be done, unless you put 40 or 50 men in there to guard it, because it is a nest of skunks and coyotes and other animals that destroy the birds that come around the edge of the water, because there is this grass that they can conceal themselves in without detection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have often heard gentlemen say before that the way to preserve wild animals was to cultivate the soil, so that they could not kill each other off. You will have to find somebody that knows more about nature than I do—and I do not know much—to make me believe any such stuff as that.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the gentleman will laugh at this: The birds that do stay there in the summer, or a great many of them, the ducks, go out on the mountain ridges, lay their eggs, and hatch their young, and do not hatch them around this body of water.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I believe that it is a common thing for water birds to go some distance from water and lay their eggs and hatch their young. That shows that these coyotes that the gentleman says are concealed in the grass could not get them.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You were just saying how dangerous it was, and said that they and the skunks were down there, and you were going to do away with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to determine and make public announcement of what lands in and around Little or Lower Klamath Lake, in Siskiyou County, Calif., and in Klamath County, Oreg., ceded to the United States by the State of California by the act entitled "An act authorizing the United States Government to lower the water levels of any or all of the following lakes: Lower or Little Klamath Lake, Tule or Rhett Lake, Goose Lake, and Clear Lake, situated in Siskiyou and Modoc Counties, and to use any part or all of the beds of said lakes for the storage of water in connection with the irrigation and reclamation operations conducted by the Reclamation Service of the United States; also ceding to the United States all right, title, interest, or claim of the State of California to any lands uncovered by the lowering of the water levels of any or all of said lakes not already disposed of by the State," and ceded to the United States by the State of Oregon by an act entitled "An act to authorize the utilization of Upper Klamath Lake, Lower or Little Klamath Lake, and Tule or Rhett Lake, situate in Klamath County, Oreg., and Goose Lake, situate in Lake County, Oreg., in connection with the irrigation and reclamation operations of the Reclamation Service of the United States, and to cede to the United States all the right, title, interest, and claim of the State of Oregon to any and all lands recovered by the lowering of the water levels or by the drainage of any or all of said lakes," will eventually be uncovered and opened to agricultural development by the lowering of the water level of said lake. Title to all said lands can be acquired by homestead entry under the general homestead laws and the provisions of this act and not otherwise: Provided, That all said lands shall forever be and remain subject to the right of the United States (a) to overflow the same or any part thereof for the purposes of irrigation by such systems of reservoirs and drainage and diking as now actually exist or may be hereafter constructed in Siskiyou County, Calif., and Klamath County, Oreg., and (b) to drain the water therefrom. All patents issued for the said lands shall expressly reserve to the United States such right of overflow and drainage.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 3, line 8, after the word "drainage," add a comma and "the title and ownership of all minerals and mineral interests in such lands, including oil, are expressly reserved to the United States."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not care to take up very much of the time of the committee on this amendment. The declared purpose of the restoration of this land to public entry is based entirely upon its agricultural possibilities. I do not know how many acres of land are included in this area covered by the description in section 1 of this bill, but evidently it is a considerable area of land.

Mr. BLANTON. Thirty-four thousand acres.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am informed by the gentleman from Texas that it embraces about 34,000 acres. Under the terms of the cession of these lands by the State of Oregon and the State of California, respectively, among the rights, titles, and interest of those States are necessarily included the mineral rights and interests, which were ceded to the Government of the United States. I do not know that in the grants any mineral interests or any mineral rights of this land are included, but I think the time has come when Congress should be careful about granting title without making reservation of the mineral interests on the public domain. The House recently passed a bill of considerable importance providing methods of leasing mineral interests owned by the Government, in order that we might derive some revenue from them. I do not assume that the members of the committee will interpose any objection to this amendment. It is not in contravention of the declared purpose of this reservation, and it seems to me we should, in this section, express a reservation of the Government's title to the mineral interests in these lands.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the amendment, if anybody desires to oppose it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. When the gentleman has concluded I will make that request.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the disposition of certain public lands, with the reservation that the Government may have the right to overflow them at any time hereafter in connection with irrigation projects.

Now, to anyone who is practical in his mind, it is perfectly well known that when the Government gives some one the right to go on this land and construct a home on it, and the Government should thereafter decide to overflow the land, the Government must pay the expense. I do not know whether this bill is intended to convey the idea that this risk shall be run by the man who acquires title to the land or not. I would like to ask my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] or my distinguished friend from California [Mr. RAKER] whether, if this reservation is put in the deed or patent issued by the Government and the Government exercises its right, it does it without expense?

Mr. RAKER. I would like to hear the gentleman from Oregon first, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think this provision was put into the bill to make it in harmony with the contract that the Government has with the Marsh Land Owners' District. Some 20,000 acres are privately owned by the Marsh Land Owners' District, the parties who put up $23,500 for the right of getting these gates closed to keep the water from the land, and in that contract there is a provision to the effect that—

2. It is understood and agreed that should the reclamation of said district lands in the manner herein contemplated prove impracticable or be not accomplished in reasonable compliance with the provisions hereof or interfere with the proper reclamation or use of public lands and it should be deemed by the United States necessary or desirable for the purpose of reclaiming or best utilizing the public lands within said marsh or swamp land area, as contemplated by the Oregon act of January 20, 1905 (General Laws of Oregon, 1905, p. 63), and the California act of February 3, 1905 (California Statutes, 1905, p. 4), to flood or overflow the same and to that end to open or regulate the gates in said Klamath Strait, the district will release, and hereby does release, and waive any and all claims for damages against the United States resulting, or that may be claimed to have resulted, to district lands by reason of their being returned on account of the opening of said gates to their normal condition as of the date hereof, or otherwise, it being the intention that the district shall protect and save harmless the United States against claims of any kind which may arise from owners of or claimants to district lands on account of the execution of this agreement.

They reserve that right as against the Marsh Land Owners' Association.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Apparently they reserve the right to do these things without cost to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Sometimes the right to do a thing means without cost, but here it is perfectly patent that if this land is occupied and made into homes and then it is overflowed, somebody will be damaged to a very considerable extent. Now, the right to overflow does not mean necessarily that it is the right to overflow without liability for the damage done, and I doubt whether that would exist. The Government of the United States has the right to go and seize property anywhere for certain purposes, but it can not do it without paying for it. It will be very interesting to know what the construction is which is put upon this language by the author of the bill, the reporter of the bill, the only one in the House interested in the bill, if the Government overflows or drains these lands hereafter and those to whom the Government has issued patents are injured thereby. Does that make the Government responsible for the injury?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not care to proceed further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that the word "lands," in line 22 of page 2, is incorrectly spelled.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the spelling will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. A great many questions have been asked regarding the lakes, with very clear answers. I would like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], the author of the bill, if these lakes are connected; do the waters flow one to the other; are there a succession of lakes? Down to where these lakes begin, the lower Klamath Lake, I suppose it is about 25 miles, is it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think so; but there is only one lake covered by this bill. The other lakes referred to on page 2 are not covered by the bill.

Mr. RAKER. I get the gentleman's question now. There is only one lake covered by this particular bill. Then there is another lake 35 miles farther east, known as Tule Lake or Rhett Lake. Forty miles farther is Clear Lake, and 40 miles farther, between Oregon and California, is another lake, known as Goose Lake, about 60 miles long and 25 miles wide, but that has nothing to do with this legislation.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke about building a conduit to draw the water from the lakes and said that probably there would be sufficient water to operate a large water-power plant. Is that the idea?

Mr. RAKER. That was the original idea.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is that the water from this particular lake?

Mr. RAKER. No; not from this particular lake at all, but from the Klamath Lake; that is, going down the Klamath River and over the Keno Falls a large water-power development could be had. That has nothing to do with this lake at all.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Why are there so many lakes mentioned in the bill when it refers only to one lake?

Mr. RAKER. Because that is the title of the act of the Legislature of California, and the title of the act of the Legislature of Oregon, and the title of the act of Congress enacting this legislation originally.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in addition to all payments required by the general homestead laws there shall be paid by homestead entrymen the amount per acre assessed as provided in section 2 of this act. Said payment shall be made in annual installments of $1 per acre except the last installment, which may be a fraction of a dollar: Provided, That the whole or any part of the amount so assessed may be paid by the entryman in a shorter period if he so elects. The first installment shall be paid at the time homestead application is filed and subsequent installments shall be due and payable on December 1 of each calendar year thereafter until the entire sum so assessed and apportioned against the lands is paid, and patent shall not issue for any of said lands until the sum so appropriated against said lands shall have been fully paid. Failure to pay any installment when due shall render the entry subject to cancellation, with a forfeiture of all moneys paid. All assessments shall draw interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from their due date until paid. All moneys paid on account of such assessments shall, without diminution of any kind whatsoever, be covered into the reclamation fund.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 4, line 22, strike out "eight" and insert "six."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the misspelling of a word. On page 4, line 18, the word "appropriated" should be "apportioned."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 4, line 18, strike out the word "appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the word "apportioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, there is another matter of misspelling of a word. The word "diminution," in line 24 is incorrectly spelled. It should be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word indicated by the gentleman from Alabama.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the author of the bill a question in regard to the rate of interest. In lines 21, 22, and 23 it is provided that—

All assessments shall draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from their due date until paid.

As I understand it, this provides only for interest on the purchase money after the purchase money is due. That is, if a man purchases a piece of land and there is a payment due the first year, the second year, the third year, and so forth, if he pays the money when the payments are due, he pays no interest at all.

Mr. RAKER. That is the purpose of it, that interest shall be paid only on deferred payments. The way it is now the Government is getting nothing, but as soon as these men file, and the payments are made at certain times, the Government will have its money all returned that it has expended.

Mr. MORGAN. How long will these payments run?

Mr. RAKER. About three years, according to the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the gentleman think that the Government ought to charge interest on these deferred payments?

Mr. RAKER. No; the Government is getting nothing now, but by opening up this land for settlement the Government gets back the whole $285,000, and interest from the time the payments become due.

Mr. MORGAN. But the settlers get these lands by paying these little assessments. The gentleman has stated that the lands are worth from $25 to $100 an acre, some of the best lands in California, and these men are to get them under the homestead law and pay nothing only this little assessment.

Mr. RAKER. It is the same way in the Reclamation Service. You do not pay interest on the money that has been expended, but only on the deferred payments after they become due.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true. But does the gentleman think that the same principle should apply here that applies in the Reclamation Service?

Mr. RAKER. Surely. You should not make any distinction here. These people are doing a gracious thing by paying back the money, and if you apply the same rule of law here that you apply to the Reclamation Service, where we have spent $100,000,000, you are treating them all alike.

Mr. MORGAN. But they do not pay the full value of these lands.

Mr. RAKER. Of course not. None of them do. In the Reclamation Service they pay only for the water.

Mr. MORGAN. You pay what it costs to reclaim the land, and if you pay what it costs to put the water on the land you pay what it is worth.

Mr. RAKER. You simply pay for the water.

Mr. MORGAN. And that amounts to $50 or $75 or $100 an acre.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman should remember that originally these were not lands of the United States, but they were ceded to the General Government by the State of Oregon and the State of California for reclamation purposes under the act which required their disposal.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, these States get no part of this payment for these lands.

Mr. RAKER. No; the States get nothing for the land under this bill, but the Government will be reimbursed to the amount of $179,327, and the balance of the $283,225 comes from this Oregon drainage district.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it not a fact that the Government in the disposition of Indian lands makes the settlers pay interest on the deferred payments from the date of the purchase? Is not that the general rule in the disposition of Indian lands under the homestead entry?

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not remember the particular rule.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me the settlers get these valuable lands under the homestead law by making small payments.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Oklahoma must remember that these settlers are the soldiers to whom he paid such an eloquent and glowing tribute a short time ago.

Mr. MORGAN. If I was doing it I would strike out the deferred payments and give it to the soldiers without any assessment at all. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That those who served with the military or naval forces of the United States during the war between the United States and Germany and her allies and have been honorably separated or discharged therefrom or placed in the Regular Army Reserve shall have preference and prior right to file upon and enter said lands under the homestead laws and the provisions of this act for a period of six months following the time said lands are opened to entry. That in opening said lands for homestead entry the Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the disposition thereof to the said soldiers, sailors, and marines, by drawing, under general rules and regulations to be promulgated by him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in line 5, after the word "Army," the words "or Naval."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 5, after the word "Army," insert the words "or Naval."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Public Lands Committee if it is not desirable to make this provision similar to the one which was contained in the measure we passed a little while ago.

Mr. SINNOTT. I agree with the gentleman that it should be made to conform with the other amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that this gives these persons who served in the military or naval forces a preference and prior right to file. Does not the gentleman think that this preference should be conditioned upon not having refused to render service or wear the uniform of the United States, the same as we had in the other bill which was passed some time ago? We put in a provision in that bill that the rights and benefits conferred by the act should not extend to any person who, having been drafted for military service under the provisions of the selective-service act, refused to render military service or wear the uniform of a soldier of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. I see no objection to that and I think it ought to be in.

Mr. WALSH. Then I will offer an amendment later to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to amend by striking out, in line 7, the word "months" and inserting the word "years."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, strike out the word "months" and insert in lieu thereof the word "years."

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, through some inadvertence, possibly through neglect of my legislative duties, I did not attend the sitting of the committee at the time this bill was reported. With as careful examination as I have been able to give it in the few minutes I have been here, I think it would be wise, basing my conclusion upon the information furnished by the gentleman from California, to make this bill a miniature of what is proposed to be done in the Lane-Mondell bill. I gather from the information furnished by the gentleman from California that the curse that fell upon the land when our first parents were driven from the Garden of Eden did not fall upon this particular tract of land.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I have such a short time——

Mr. BLANTON. I did not understand what the gentleman said exactly. Did he say the lame Mondell bill?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The gentleman from Texas understood me. I do not wish to be interrupted by frivolous questions. The fact is, gentlemen of this committee, when the Lane-Mondell bill was reported it seems to have made little progress, despite the fact that nine gentlemen on the minority side and eight on the majority reported the bill favorably.

Taking the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who seems to be thoroughly familiar with the circumstances, a gentleman associated with me upon the Public Lands Committee, that we should—and I speak seriously—make this a miniature, if we can, of the Lane-Mondell bill.

There is not enough land involved here to do any harm. The country would suffer no inconvenience, agriculture would not be disturbed in any way if this land should not come under settlement as rapidly as might be if it was open for six months and the ex-soldiers did not care to file on this land.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from California if the jurisdiction which is extended in this section to the Secretary of the Interior, as suggested in the last paragraph, in offering the land for homestead entry would carry the power to designate the amount of land into which each tract would be subdivided for the purpose of homesteading. Can the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. RAKER. My view is that it would be 160 acres under the homestead law by paying the assessment that goes to the reclamation fund.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I thank the gentleman for the information. The description given by the gentleman is in such glowing terms, that 10,000 tons of hay went to waste, would seem to give the negative suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts a few days ago in discussing some of this western country. I was led to believe that if the King of Babylon when he was serving out his sentence, when he was driven from the kingdom, did eat grass and had depended on the pasturage of Wyoming or some of these Western States he would have perished for the want of grass before he had completed his sentence. [Laughter.] It seems that it does not apply in this case. Speaking seriously, I believe this amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Let the gentleman take five minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I shall not take more than one to complete the statement. The small amount of land in this tract, the wonderful opportunity here presented, the fact that this land will be under the disposition of the Secretary of the Interior, all this will afford that department of our Government a chance to demonstrate in this instance, where no grant of land is involved, the desirability of such legislation by giving six years in which the soldiers may have an opportunity in which to file and avail themselves of the opportunity presented in the measure. I want to say to you in the time that has been so kindly granted to me that there is a question in my mind, speaking from a general standpoint, whether the soldiers of this country in large number care to enter the occupation of agriculture at this time. It is a question in my mind whether the soldier's settlement bill proposed in the Lane-Mondell bill, or even in the Morgan bill—and I favor the Morgan bill from start to finish and so declare it here—will be attracted in large numbers from the congested population of our cities into the profession of agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Kansas has made a very clear statement, but it does not apply to the matter in hand. As an illustration, let us say this is provided for six years——

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. He is familiar with the circumstances and with the provisions of the bill. He knows the physical conditions that exist, and he has given a clear exposition of the matter in our hearing. Does the gentleman from California not believe that this land will be quickly taken by the soldiers?

Mr. RAKER. It will be taken.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. And that it should be exclusively for them?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Then, what objection can he have to my amendment?

Mr. RAKER. That is the reason I am going to explain.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Just prior to the consideration of this bill we took up and passed a joint resolution in which it was provided that two months would be granted in which to make entry. I endeavored to have that amended to make it six months.

Mr. RAKER. Just put the question and I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. MORGAN. I will try not to take up too much of the gentleman's time, and if I do I will get his time extended. In the gentleman's bill——

Mr. RAKER. This is the committee's bill.

Mr. MORGAN. He provides for six months in which the soldiers may make entry, and if I remember correctly, when I proposed my amendment to the other bill he opposed my amendment.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman did not hear me say anything about it.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there not some inconsistency——

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman did not hear me say anything about his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps I am mistaken, but is it not inconsistent to pass one bill giving——

Mr. RAKER. Oh, do not take up my time. Ask the question.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it not inconsistent to pass one bill giving two months preference and immediately afterwards report a bill and pass it giving six months. Is not that an inconsistency?

Mr. RAKER. To provide for six months after the land is thrown open will give the soldiers, those provided for in the bill, an opportunity to file their applications. The land will be disposed of at the first drawing. As an illustration, 40 miles from this, over on the west side, there were about 5,000 acres of land opened two years ago under the drawing plan. There was no rush, no crush; there was nothing of people spending their money foolishly. The land was declared to be open, and they could proceed to make their filings. They sent their applications in, and those who succeeded in getting the land were authorized to make their filings, and the land was all disposed of at the first drawing, and everyone was satisfied.

In six months this will be disposed of, but under the gentleman's amendment it would continue it along for six years. They would have to wait six years before the Secretary of the Interior could dispose of the land at all. It would delay the matter for six years. We say to give them six months. The Secretary can dispose of all of it. Every bit of it will be taken. There are enough men now ready and willing and anxious throughout this country, multiplied by twenty thousand, to take this land and ten times more, who were soldiers, and who want to take land, but do not hold this off for six months for opening.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Does the gentleman carry the idea that it would affect the disposal of the lands in the least?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; for that period.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will not the applications be made at once?

Mr. RAKER. For a period of six months, following the time the lands are open for entry. The Secretary of the Interior in six months can by advertising and by the drawing plan have every acre of that land with a man on it, and there will be no vacant land, and they will all be soldiers. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I am very much interested in the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE]. I can not understand this section myself. It says that these soldiers, sailors, and marines shall have a period of six months only after the passage of this act and the opening of the land for settlement. They will not know anything about it in six months' time. It seems to me that while perhaps six years is too long a period, it ought to be longer than six months. Six months looks to me a good deal of a camouflage, and I think we ought to do something for these soldiers that we have talked about.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Although this bill is general, and it should be, does the gentleman not know that there are enough men within 20 miles of this land who were in the service, who are back home, who are ready to file on this land if they get a chance?

Mr. EMERSON. Would these men have the opportunity to go in there in six months' time to take up this land?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; six months after the land is opened to make their applications to take the land.

Mr. EMERSON. I want to understand the gentleman. Do they know about this opportunity?

Mr. RAKER. I will say maybe within a 50-mile radius of this land there are enough soldiers——

Mr. EMERSON. That does not answer the question. Will they know about it?

Mr. RAKER. They know about it now. They know this bill is pending, are anxiously awaiting its passage and approval, and will get on the land the first moment they are given the opportunity. Give them a chance.

Mr. EMERSON. If the gentleman says they know it now, I do not wish to argue it further.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat? Is it the proper purpose of this bill, in the gentleman's mind, that this service shall be extended only to soldiers within a radius of 20 or 50 miles of this land, or should it be general?

Mr. EMERSON. I think it should be general. At the same time, I am not particular. I am in favor of doing something for the soldiers, sailors, and marines. We have done nothing so far. We have not done a thing, and I think we ought to do something.

Mr. RAKER. Then let us vote for this bill and dispose of it. There are enough of them now within a short radius who know about it to take up this land.

Mr. EMERSON. If there are enough there now to take up the land, I will withdraw any objection I have.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will not adopt the policy of saying that no one shall go upon the public lands except those who were drafted in the recent war. In the first place, I would not cut out all men who were under the proper age, either too young or too old. The soldiers are not mendicants. To hear some talk around the Halls of this House one would think that the soldier boys who went into the war—those who went across the water and those who did not—who have been discharged from service are now on their uppers, dependent upon charity for a living. That is not the case. They are just as able to take care of themselves as anybody in the country, quite competent to look after their interest individually. What a great many men of this House fear is that they are too competent to look after their interests collectively, and that because they may organize, therefore, men here must bow abjectly to what they think is to the interest of the soldiers, though the soldiers may not want it, without regard to the interest of the rest of the people. There are a great many other people in the United States besides the four millions who went into the war. There is no reason why all the rest of the people of the country who were not subject to draft should be prevented from having an opportunity to gain a homestead right, and I hope that we will not get so far gone or stricken with terror by some imaginary dragon that may threaten us that we will forget all the people of the United States except those who may be particularly our wards in one sense—the soldiers. I feel quite willing to give the men who went into the Army some preference. We passed a bill awhile ago to give them a preference of two months in making application for homesteads. That is a considerable preference. All of these preferences are to the interest not of the soldiers generally throughout the country, but the soldiers locally in the district where the land is open. Now we have a bill to give them six months' preference, and I must confess it is rather difficult for me to understand how the same committee reports a bill, general in its character, to give two months' preference and then a special bill, introduced by one member of the committee, to give six months' preference.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Does not the gentleman from Illinois believe that there is quite a difference between the provisions of the joint resolution passed this morning and this bill, the former providing 60 days' preferential right of entry to homesteads, whereas this provides six months in which selection must be by drawing by lot?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, it is to enter under the homestead laws just the same as the other, and the other may be by lot. There is no difference between the two provisions.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under section 4 of this bill the applicant has to make payment down of a dollar an acre.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very likely there is a difference, but that is not substantial at all. The amendment that is now pending is to make it six years. Now, it will amount to nothing as far as this bill is concerned, I take it, and probably will not amount to anything as far as any land is concerned that is worth anything, and it is not to the interest, in my judgment, to advertise to any man that he has a preference to do something which is a damage for him to do, and there will be some of these public lands that are not an asset but a liability if the man gets it. There is no reason for extending the time, and there is no reason why everybody here should be carried off his feet in the way of legislation and act as though the only people we had to look after at all in the country were the men who went into the Army, and we have to look after them as though they were charity seekers and had to be taken care of out of the Public Treasury. If there is any class of people in the country who are able to work their own way along by their own efforts, it is the young men of the country who went into the war and who, in addition to their natural ability, acquired the learning that enables them to take care of themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 12, strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the rights and benefits conferred by this act shall not extend to any person who, having been drafted for military service under the provisions of the selective-service act, shall have refused to render military service or to wear the uniform of a soldier of the United States."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, that is identical with the proviso contained in the joint resolution which we passed sometime ago.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the author of the bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] in regard to the first line in section 5, page 5. Now, in the bill we passed this morning it says "any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine" shall have certain rights of entry. In section 5 of this bill it starts out and says:

That those who served with the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MORGAN. Wait until I ask the question, my dear friend. My question is this: Do those words, "those who served," and so forth, mean the same as "officers, soldiers, sailors, marines," and so forth?

Mr. RAKER. That means everybody in the service of the United States during the war.

Mr. MORGAN. Does it include the nurses that were in service in the Army and Navy?

Mr. RAKER. All of them that were in the service in the war.

Mr. MORGAN. So this language was intended to include nurses, for instance?

Mr. RAKER. I asked the same question of Mr. MONDELL when he appeared before the committee—and this provision is the same as in the Mondell-Lane bill—and Mr. MONDELL said, "Yes; I believe it does include nurses."

Mr. MORGAN. It includes nurses?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Does it include field clerks, so called?

Mr. RAKER. All that were enrolled in this service.

Mr. MORGAN. It says all who served with the Army and Navy. Does it include Y. M. C. A. workers?

Mr. RAKER. It includes all who were enrolled.

Mr. MORGAN. This does not say "enrolled."

Mr. RAKER. This language was intended to apply to all those who served in any capacity in the Army.

Mr. MORGAN. It says "who served with," but does not say "who served in" the Army or Navy. It says those who served with the military service. So that it includes Y. M. C. A. workers——

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so.

Mr. MORGAN. And Knights of Columbus.

Mr. RAKER. I do not think it does. They were not in the Army.

Mr. MORGAN. They served with the Army and Navy.

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so.

Mr. MORGAN. It does not say enrolled. I think the gentleman ought to amend this language so as to make it specific and certain.

Mr. RAKER. Everybody so concedes it.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I am somebody, and I do not concede it.

Mr. RAKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MORGAN. And I do not think the gentleman is justified in saying everybody would. The gentleman does not know how this would be construed. We ought to be definite and certain in our language so far as we can. I asked a very distinguished gentleman of this House what that meant, and he said it would only include soldiers, sailors, and marines, because it said down there further that they should be honorably discharged or separated from the service. A very distinguished gentleman of this House puts that construction on it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that in line 1 the word "in" should be substituted for the word "with"?

Mr. MORGAN. Would not that exclude nurses? Now, the gentleman intends to include nurses.

Mr. WALSH. It does not exclude them.

Mr. MORGAN. Why not?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nurses are a part of the Army.

Mr. WALSH. They are enrolled and discharged the same as a soldier.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, my object was to get before the committee just what was meant by this language. I do not know that I have any objection to the broad construction put upon it by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. I will not offer any amendment, but I wanted to get into our minds just what we were intending by this.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On page 5, line 1, strike out the word "with" and insert the word "in."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I do this because the House just passed House joint resolution No. 20 a few moments ago, in which the language then given legislative approval was providing the privilege of entering on land to officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Germany. So it seemed to me that, in order to prevent any possible confusion of language as to whether some outsiders attached to the organization would be included in this, it would be best to make it positive and limit it to those who served in the Army and Navy and certain other forces.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Most assuredly.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, who watches legislation very carefully and critically, what is the reason for the language "during the war between the United States and Germany and her allies"? We were not at war with any of the allies of Germany——

Mr. GARD. With Austria.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Except one. Does not he think if we strike out "and her allies" that the legislation would be sufficiently comprehensive?

Mr. GARD. I think so. I think it would be sufficiently comprehensive to leave out the word "allies."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would the gentleman permit me to interject a question there? If the House passes two bills on the same day on the same subject, from the same committee, and in one place refers to it as "the war with Germany" and in the other as "war with Germany and her allies," would not a person construing the statute assume there was some reason for making the distinction?

Mr. GARD. Yes; the reason would be the more comprehensive mind of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. Both bills were prepared by the Department of the Interior, probably by the same clerk, with the usual carelessness of clerks up there in preparing bills, and that carelessness ought to be corrected when it comes to a body like this, that is careful. We are always careful here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in order to make the bill correspond the best we can with the joint resolution that was passed this morning, it seems to me, if it has not already been done, that the language "six months," on line 7 of page 5, should be stricken out, and the words "60 days" inserted instead.

Mr. SINNOTT. That has been inserted already.

Mr. GARD. I was under the impression that it had not been.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I was mistaken in that.

Mr. GARD. Strike out the words "six months" and insert the words "60 days."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SINNOTT. Would not that be subject to a point of order? We have already voted to retain "six months."

Mr. GARD. No; we have not. There has been no vote on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is mistaken. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 5, line 7, strike out the words "six months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "60 days."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, it is true that this amendment would make this bill correspond with the resolution that we passed a little while ago, but I do not think that it would be well to have two bills wrong. We had better have one bill right and one wrong than two wrong. I think the other bill or resolution was wrong. I think this is right. I think the soldiers should be allowed six months at least. We ought to give the soldiers six months' benefit. Two months is too short. I hope the House will not amend this bill and make it wrong when it is already right.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no difference, so far as I can read, between House joint resolution 20 and this bill, H. R. 8440, so far as the privilege of entering upon the public land is concerned; and as frankly stated by both the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] there is no question but that this land, opened in the territory where it is, will be immediately entered upon by those in the military service who happen to reside in the very limited territory contiguous thereto.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is mistaken. I merely asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] if there were enough men to fill that land. But it will be opened generally by soldiers throughout the United States.

Mr. GARD. But those people will be the ones who will enter and file upon it.

Mr. SINNOTT. There will be more applicants than land to supply them.

Mr. GARD. I see that the bill is so drawn that the land can be entered by soldiers generally, but everybody knows that this land out there, while general in its nature, is truly and literally restricted in its benefits locally. I do not think there is going to be any exodus of soldier boys from Boston or New York or Maine or Massachusetts or Ohio to take up any of this land out on the shores of Goose Lake. The boys in the majority of the States of the American Union are competent and willing and able to take care of themselves, and they do not care to enter upon these lands, so that the whole thing resolves itself down to a question of giving land locally to people in that limited territory. They all know about it, and they will enter upon it in 60 days or in six minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman made his statement that it would be all local. In the last two weeks there have been at least 10 gentlemen residing in Washington who have inquired of me and others as to opportunities in the West where their soldier sons may get public lands. The gentleman says it will all be a local affair, because these other people have not been advised. If you make it six months, there will be that much more notice and so much more opportunity offered for other people to go out there and establish their claims if they want to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On page 5, line 3, strike out the words "and her allies."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 5, line 3, after the word "Germany," strike out the language "and her allies."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall determine which of the lands now within the boundaries of the Klamath Lake Bird Reserve are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which for the purpose of said reservation, and shall open to homestead entry those lands which are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes: Provided, That the shore line of the lake, including the smallest legal subdivision of land adjoining the flow line, shall remain in the possession of the United States, but access may be provided to the lake for such canals as may be necessary for irrigation, drainage, and domestic water supply.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. SINNOTT] or the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] what the meaning of the language is in lines 23 and 24, on page 5, "are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which for the purpose of said reservation"? What does that mean? Does it mean the lands which are valuable for the purposes of said reservation?

Mr. SINNOTT. More valuable for a bird reserve than for agricultural purposes.

Mr. WALSH. It says:

which of the lands * * * are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which for the purpose of said reservation.

Does that mean which is valuable for the purposes of such reservation?

Mr. SINNOTT. I should think that the Secretary would determine what land is more valuable and needed for the bird reserve, and if he finds that it is valuable for the bird reserve it would not be subject to entry.

Mr. WALSH. Then the gentleman thinks that means—which * * * are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which—are chiefly valuable—for the purpose of said reservation?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. I think it is qualified by the word "chiefly."

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] agree with the chairman of the committee in that regard?

Mr. RAKER. I understand that the Secretary is to make two designations, first, of those chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and, second, of those chiefly valuable for the bird reserve.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read from the letter from the Department of Agriculture on that matter, found on page 4 of the report. It is stated by the Acting Secretary that—

Section 7 of the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall determine which lands are chiefly valuable for agriculture and which are chiefly valuable for the purposes of the reservation.

Mr. WALSH. Then this language is intended to convey that idea?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be my construction of it.

Mr. WALSH. Upon consideration I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should like to make an inquiry about this section. Is this the same land that is provided for in the rest of the bill or is this different land?

Mr. RAKER. This is the same land.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is this the only authority that the Secretary now has? Is it under this section?

Mr. RAKER. I do not believe so. I think it is provided in section 3 of the bill that the land shall be surveyed and opened to entry; but the department in going over it believed it would be advisable to make the special designation contained in section 7.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The department are of the opinion that doing a thing once was not sufficient.

Mr. RAKER. Not in that way.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That it was necessary to do it twice?

Mr. RAKER. Not in that way.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Having provided in the bill for the disposition of the land, having provided who should have the right to take it, having made provision for the disposition of it in every way once, then you start in a second time and make a second disposition of it?

Mr. RAKER. I do not quite gather that view of it. This specifically says that the Secretary shall make ascertainment, and when he finds that the land is chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes he shall set it aside for that purpose. If there is any doubt, it goes to agriculture; but if it is chiefly valuable for the bird reserve, it is retained in the bird reserve.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. As I understand it, the bird reserve does not cover all of the lands in question.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; it covers all of the lands in question and other privately owned lands besides.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understood that the bird reserve was a smaller portion of the entire area.

Mr. RAKER. No; the bird reserve covers all of this land and even privately owned lands as well as public lands.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what wonderful mind drew this bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], but I will absolve him from that responsibility in his own interest.

Section 3 provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause said lands to be surveyed and opened to entry under the general homestead laws and the provisions of this act.

Then the bill goes ahead and makes provision in reference to those lands that the Secretary is ordered to throw open to homestead entry, and it provides that ex-soldiers and ex-sailors shall have a preference right, and provides that those who go upon the lands before they are thrown open shall have no right. Then having disposed of all of the lands, along comes this section 7 and says that the Secretary of the Interior shall find out which lands are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which are chiefly valuable for some other purposes. I do not know just what would happen then. It is the same land which you have provided shall be thrown open to homestead entry. Then it directs the Secretary of the Interior to find which of these lands are chiefly valuable for a bird reserve. What difference does it make? You ordered them thrown open to homestead entry. I am trying to get information. Do not understand that I am making positive statements. They are all followed by an interrogation mark.

Mr. RAKER. The land is to be surveyed——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is, under section 3.

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Then, the Secretary of the Interior must designate which lands are chiefly valuable for agriculture. That designation then opens that land for homestead entry.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But section 3 provides that said lands shall be surveyed and opened to entry under the general homestead law.

Mr. RAKER. That is all right.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Having thrown them open to entry, they are subject to entry.

Mr. RAKER. That is, subject to the subsequent entry. Section 7 was inserted in the bill so that we could hedge around, so that we could protect the bird reserve, so that there would be no misunderstanding and no disagreement after the many conferences that have been had between the various departments, so that the land chiefly valuable for agriculture should be opened to homestead entry and the land chiefly valuable for the bird reserve should remain in the bird reserve, unaffected by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. It seems to me the obscurity in this language can best be illuminated by the use of a medical expression.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us not have any Latin terms that we do not understand.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply offer this for purposes of elucidation. It seems to me that the section merely throws upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to make a differential diagnosis between lands chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and those chiefly valuable for the bird reserve, and that is about all there is in it.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to have the gentleman's opinion as to what the Secretary of the Interior will do in the dilemma in case he finds that neither one is fit for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He is directed by section 3 to cause said lands to be open for entry under the general homestead law. The additions suggested by the gentleman—"and provisions of this act"—would have reference to the preference of the soldier. He is directed to open all the lands to homestead entry under section 3. Under section 7 he is directed to find out which of the lands is chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes, and only open them to homestead entry. My inquiry, first, was whether these were the same lands. Having directed him to throw them all open to homestead entry I did not see how it was practicable in another part of the bill, in reference to the same lands, to direct him to throw only a part of them open to entry.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Illinois is always clear on these matters and sees that the bills are in proper shape, and we commend him for it. Will the gentleman look at lines 21 and 22, on page 3, "open to entry under the general homestead law and the provisions of this act"? Turning to section 7, a part of the provisions of this act, it says that in addition to the preference rights the Secretary must designate which of the lands is chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Section 3 directs him to open all the lands for homestead entry, and where it puts in "under the provisions of this act," that is in connection with the homestead law and is to take care of the preference given to soldiers. I do not know how the Secretary of the Interior will construe such a statute. It may be that he knows what it means.

Mr. RAKER. This language was gone over by the Department of the Interior, by the Reclamation Service, by the lawyer of the Reclamation Service, by the Secretary of Agriculture, by the Biological Survey and the specialists in that division, by the various officers of that service to the end that we should keep as much of the land as is fit for the bird reserve and only throw open that which could be used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. In the event of the contingency happening mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio that the land is not fit for a bird reserve or for agricultural purposes, the birds would still have a right to stay there?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will refer that to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the explanation ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it is satisfactory to the gentleman from North Carolina, all right.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were, 30 ayes and 4 noes.

So the committee determined to rise.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8440) to restore to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for a bird reservation is Siskiyou and Modoc Counties, Calif., and Klamath County, Oreg., and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment; if not, the Chair will put them in gross?

There was no demand for a separate vote and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 43 ayes and 6 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DEWALT (at the request of Mr. WHALEY) was given leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9822. An act to authorize the President of the United States to arrange and participate in an international conference to consider questions relating to international communication; and

H. R. 3754. An act to amend sections 8 and 21 of the copyright act, approved March 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2497. An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

AMERICAN SOLDIER DEAD IN FRANCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think it should be a matter of some concern to Congress what is being done to care for the graves of the American soldiers who fell in France and what is being done properly to identify and make permanent the identification of the bodies of our soldiers who are buried there. I therefore introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 133) creating a commission to report on the practicability of bringing to the United States the remains of American soldiers buried in France and to mark and care for the graves of those whose remains it is not practicable to remove was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 133) creating a commission to report on the practicability of bringing to the United States the remains of American soldiers buried in France, and to mark and care for the graves of those whose remains it is not practicable to remove.

Resolved, etc., That a commission of nine members be selected, to consist of one Senator in Congress, named by the President of the Senate, one Representative in Congress, named by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the ambassador of the United States to France, and three members of the American Legion, to be chosen by the national executive committee of that organization, said commission to report to Congress prior to the close of the present session upon the practicability of having disinterred, transported to the United States, and properly disposed of upon arrival in this country of the remains of former members of the American Expeditionary Forces who lost their lives in France through wounds or disease during the World War; be it further

Resolved, That the commission herein provided for is hereby authorized and empowered to take any necessary steps to locate and mark the graves of American soldiers buried in the soil of France, the transportation of whose remains to the United States may by said commission be deemed impracticable, and to that end said commission is hereby authorized to purchase and cause to be erected headstones for the purpose indicated; be it further

Resolved, That in each cemetery in France containing the remains of American soldiers whose removal to the United States may, by said commission, be deemed impracticable, a monument shall be erected as a memorial to those who sacrificed their lives in behalf of the cause for which the United States entered the war; be it further

Resolved, That said commission be and is hereby authorized and empowered to negotiate for and consummate the purchase of any lands needed for the purposes herein set forth, whether as burial lots or sites for monuments; be it further

Resolved, That said commission be and is hereby empowered and directed to make any and all arrangements necessary for the care of the graves of American soldiers in France, and to employ caretakers and all other persons needed for their protection and the protection of such headstones and monuments as may be erected as herein provided; be it further

Resolved, That all agencies heretofore, now, or hereafter acting under authority of the War Department or any of its representatives, which have been or are now discharging or shall hereafter discharge any functions relating to the location and marking of soldiers' graves, are authorized and directed to report to the commission hereby created and to act under the authority and jurisdiction of the same during the period of its existence; and be it further

Resolved, That the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and it is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of said commission, and to make any purchases and carry out any contracts hereby authorized.

REGULATION OF STREET TRAFFIC IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer and to have read a resolution referring to the use of the streets in the city of Washington, D. C., and to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 255), as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the frequent personal injuries and deaths of pedestrians on the streets of Washington by being struck by automobiles is a grave menace to the safety of the people of Washington. The frequent occurrence of such deaths and injuries indicate a reckless violation of speed regulations and of the crowded streets and a disregard for the safety of the general public. Life is of more importance to the many than mere speed to a few careless, indifferent drivers of such vehicles.

Be it declared as the sense of the Senate that the regulation governing such forms of transportation be strengthened and enforced by thorough observation and that the police department of the District of Columbia be supported in such enforcement in all ways at the command of the Senate.

Be it further declared as the sense of the Senate that the Committee on the District of Columbia thereof consider and report a proper bill providing for additional restrictions upon speed at places dangerous to the general public and for more rigorous penalties, declaring in case of negligent driving of such vehicles punishment as for manslaughter or murder, to the end that the streets of Washington may not be the most dangerous places in the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution which has just been read, if the Senate will indulge me a moment, I desire to say that within the last 24 hours in the city of Washington five accidents—to grace them by that name—have occurred, three of which are serious, resulting in broken bones, concussion of the brain, and unconsciousness on the part of the victims. A short time before that a lady from Florida was knocked down and she died at the George Washington University Hospital within the last 48 hours. I wish to state that in my personal experience within the last two weeks in Washington, at places where no policemen are found, at crowded crossings and at points for the receiving and discharging of passengers from street cars, automobile drivers, while the street car was stopped and a concourse of passengers was at each end of the car, have sounded their horns, notifying the passengers to disperse and make passageway for the advancing automobile, and the passengers have had to run for the curbstone or get behind the car in order to protect themselves against the driver, who was violating a regulation of the city of Washington. No machine has a right to pass a standing car while it is receiving or discharging passengers.

In my personal experience the occurrence referred to has been within the last two weeks repeated twice, and myself and others had been driven off the street by the sounding of automobile horns. They were not emergency cases; there were no Red Cross signs on the vehicles; there were no ambulance signs; they were not vehicles entitled to the right of way. However, passengers have been driven away from the cars and driven off the streets by reckless drivers who, with the utmost unconcern, have gone through crowds of passengers.

The great bulk of the automobile passenger traffic in Washington is in the hands of careful and experienced drivers, and no complaint could be made as to them, but it is the one reckless driver by which all drivers are measured. I think those who are careful in the management of machines ought to have as much interest in this matter as have the pedestrians, so that they may be relieved from the ill will that may follow through the reckless conduct of the few who are regardless of the safety of the public.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to compliment the chairman of the District Committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], in taking up this subject and looking to the enactment of laws which will protect the public in the streets of Washington. I myself have had some experience in automobile legislation, the first licensing and registration act in New Jersey having been introduced by me in the New Jersey Legislature. That act has been practically copied by 23 States in the Union.

It is necessary to impose grave penalties for recklessness; it is necessary to protect the crossings with proper police supervision and direction; but the basis of all regulation, so far as automobiles are concerned, lies in a proper act licensing automobile drivers requiring the examination of automobile drivers by a board to ascertain whether or not they are mentally and physically capable of running an automobile, an examination which will show whether they are familiar with the traffic laws, and then providing a penalty for the violation of the speed laws and the traffic laws of the city, including a suspension and deprivation of driving privileges if they violate those laws.

I make the suggestion to the chairman of the committee that if he will propose and secure the enactment of a law for the examination of all drivers of automobiles in the city of Washington and providing severe penalties for violation of the law he will remove the abuse and menace to the traveling public.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that in connection with my remarks there be printed in the RECORD without reading a clipping from last night's Star.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MRS. WILLARD DIES FROM AUTO INJURY—INQUEST TO-DAY IN CASE OF FLORIDA WOMAN HURT MONDAY NIGHT.

Mrs. Augustus S. Willard, of Palatka, Fla., who was knocked down by an automobile at Fourteenth and K Streets Monday night and seriously injured, died at George Washington University Hospital yesterday afternoon. Her death resulted from a fracture of the skull.

Coroner Nevitt viewed the body and decided to hold an inquest at the morgue at 3 o'clock this afternoon. Charles Edward Jones, driver of the automobile that killed Mrs. Willard, was detained by the police.

INJURED AT FOURTEENTH AND H STREETS.

Robert Tucker, 2715 Thirteenth Street, was struck by a Capital Traction car at Fourteenth and H Streets about 6.30 o'clock last night and seriously hurt. He was suffering from concussion of the brain and bruises and was unconscious. He was taken to Emergency Hospital.

An automobile belonging to Rev. Francis Yingling, pastor of the Church of Our Lady of Victory, last night struck Miss Mary J. Baldwin and Miss Emma Baldwin, Northumberland apartments, at New Hampshire Avenue and U Street. They were able to go home after treatment at Emergency Hospital.

Mrs. Alice McGuire, 1252 Twenty-first Street, was knocked down by an automobile near the intersection of New Hampshire Avenue and Twenty-first Street last night and her right leg fractured. W. H. Leitch, Fort Myer Heights, Va., driver of the automobile, took Mrs. McGuire to Emergency Hospital.

KNOCKED DOWN BY VEHICLE.

John W. Germuller and Miss Theresa Germuller, his sister, residing at 611 I Street, were knocked down by a motor vehicle driven by John W. Goodman, 1362 North Carolina Avenue NE., at Pennsylvania Avenue and Sixth Street last night. Mr. Germuller's left shoulder was fractured, while his sister received bruises on the left side of her head. They were taken to the Casualty Hospital.

Charles Ball, 809 Ninth Street, received a fracture of his left arm last night as a result of being knocked down by an automobile at Seventh and K Streets. Joseph A Drain, 1754 Massachusetts Avenue, owner and driver of the automobile, took the injured man to George Washington University Hospital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and printed.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS AS CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate resolution which I send to the desk. I do not think it will lead to any debate whatever.

The resolution (S. Res. 256) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, respectively requested to transmit to the Senate, as early as practicable, a statement showing the name, rank, and total compensation of every officer in their respective departments who, at the time they were commissioned, were employed by a civil branch of the Government, and the compensation such officers were receiving as civilian employees at the time they were commissioned.

COAL-MINING PROFITS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I offer a Senate resolution and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The resolution (S. Res. 257) was read and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate, as promptly as possible, a statement showing the dividends paid by corporations engaged in the mining and production of bituminous coal within the United States for the years 1917 and 1918; that if such information is not already in the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he be requested to procure the same and transmit it to the Senate as promptly as may be practicable.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR POMERENE.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have here a copy of a very able, statesmanlike address upon the subject of the industrial conditions of the times, recently delivered by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] at a meeting in New York of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents. It is a most valuable contribution to the subject which is discussed, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRIKES AND THE GOVERNMENT.

(Address by Senator POMERENE before Association of Life Insurance Presidents, New York, the 5th of December, 1919.)

"I assume these statements to be self-evident:

"It is the business of government to govern, else it ceases to be government.

"Every man has the right to 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'

"Government must not interfere with man in these pursuits so long as he does not interfere with the same right when exercised by his neighbor.

"Government must interfere when any man or class attempts to deny to others the exercise of the right which he claims for himself, otherwise there is 'confusion worse confounded.'

"In the United States under the Government which has been handed down to us by our fathers the right of revolution does not exist. Life and property are and must be safe and secure against any infringement whatsoever, save and except under the orderly processes of law.

"This does not mean that our citizens do not have the right to change the fundamental principles of their Government or the Government itself, because under our Constitutions, both National and State, the right to change the Constitution—or, in other words, the Government—is secured to the citizen in the form and manner therein prescribed.

"By this statement I do not mean to be understood as denying to the oppressed the right to better their conditions, but I do mean to say that under the Government of the United States there is no excuse for oppression and no excuse for tyranny. We recognize only one autocrat, and it is the supreme majesty of the law. To it every man must bend the knee, whether he be employer or employee, prince or pauper, giant or pigmy.

"The seat of the Government of the United States is and always will be at Washington under the dome of the Capitol. It never will be transferred to a place under the hat of any would-be autocrat whether he be a leader of capital, of labor, or of any other class.

"Years ago the American spirit was startled because a Vanderbilt had said, 'The public be damned.' But Vanderbilt seems to have had no patent upon the phrase, or if he had it is being infringed to-day by men who have as little regard for the public welfare as he himself had. There is no difference in kind between him and a Foster, who, aided by the extreme socialists and I. W. W. classes of the country, aims to enlist under his leadership the iron and steel workers of a nation and to paralyze industry; or a Lewis, who, to further his own ambitions, aided as he has been by the same elements, calls 400,000 men out of the mines and says to the public, 'Freeze and starve.'

"I do not wish to be misunderstood. I recognize that labor has not always received its portion of the product of its hand. I would resolve all doubts in its favor. I would deal with it not only justly but liberally at all times. If the American people have one characteristic that shines out brilliantly over and above all others, it is its innate sense of justice and liberality.

"I recognize that there are many instances in which the public has not been put in possession of the facts, or it does not see clearly through the maze of uncertainty that surrounds them, but when the light of publicity is turned on any controversy which relates to the welfare of either the individual or a class, injustice and wrong will wither away before the light of public opinion; and if at any time it does not thus disappear it is because it has become so strongly intrenched that it has become a menace not only to the public but to the Government itself. And when government itself is challenged, it must accept the issue or it ceases to carry out the purpose for which all government is designed.

"Government—that agency of our people designed by all of the people for the protection of all of the people! We almost live and move and have our being because of it. We often do not appreciate it until its protecting arm is withdrawn. It is like the air about us. We live in it. We breathe it. We are not conscious of its presence until it is taken away.

"To borrow a phrase from Vice President Marshall, 'Man is God-made; class is man-made.' Man owes his freedom to God who made him. Class owes its dependence—its bondage, if you please—to the man who made it.

"In the tempestuous voyage over the sea of industrial trouble two facts shine out through the mist of fog and uncertainty which envelop us like beacon lights to guide us:

"First. Europe shall not Europeanize or bolshevize America.

"Second. America will Americanize every foreigner who stays in our midst; otherwise he can not stay.

"Now, let us make some practical applications of these facts.

THE POLICE STRIKE IN BOSTON.

"Shall the police force of a great city, clothed with the badge of authority by a sovereign State, under the leadership of walking delegates, knowing that they are the physical embodiment of the law itself and the only protection which a defenseless people have against the assaults of the criminally bent, be allowed for any cause whatever to enter into a conspiracy whereby in violation of the duties they owe their city and their State, and in utter disregard of public safety, cease to function and leave the city at the mercy of the outlaw?

"Must a sovereign State let its hands be tied and submit to this indignity while some third party living without the State says, in substance, to the governor and its people, 'Restore these officers to their places and I will try to settle the differences between you and them?' Thank God, the people of the sovereign State of Massachusetts said, 'No!' and the law-abiding people of 47 other States joined the chorus.

"But it is said these men were not receiving sufficient compensation. If they were not, then those who were in authority ought to have increased it. We know as a matter of long experience that public tribunals are often slow to function under the limitations of their authority; but slow though they may have been in this instance, it did not furnish an excuse for a thousand or more policemen to strike and lay down their maces. There is one duty to self. There is a higher duty every man owes to the public. And every policeman in Boston who entered into the conspiracy to quit and leave the people of the city unprotected deserved to be court-martialed and drummed out of the city.

STRIKES IN PRIVATE INDUSTRY.

"I recognize the fact that when we come to consider the strike as related to private industry many very different elements enter the discussion which must be considered.

"I do not wish to be understood as denying to the employee in the private industrial world, as contradistinguished from transportation in interstate commerce, the right to strike under proper conditions.

"I do not wish to have it understood that I defend the course taken by the United States Steel Corporation officials in their relations with the representatives of the American Federation of Labor. The public generally understands the two diametrically opposite viewpoints of the Steel Corporation and the American Federation of Labor, so far as they relate to the recognition of outside representatives of labor in the controversy between the corporation and their employees.

"But it has seemed to me, as I study this subject, that it was very unwise from every viewpoint for the corporation to refuse to answer the letter of Mr. Gompers asking for an audience for the purpose of discussing matters relating to the welfare of hundreds of thousands of employees. Common courtesy required an answer.

"I think it may be fairly said, in a word, that Judge Gary's reason for not answering the letter and granting the audience was his belief that a conference with the leaders of the American Federation of Labor would have been a recognition of the closed-shop method of employment, and the real reason which prompted Mr. Gompers in asking for an interview was to get the corporation to recognize the right of the American Federation of Labor to intervene in any controversy which had arisen or might hereafter arise between the corporation and its employees. To meet in conference with labor leaders touching subjects of mutual interest between the company and its men could not have been a recognition of the closed shop.

"It seems to me that Judge Gary—looking at it wholly from his own viewpoint—could very well have said: 'Mr. Gompers is the titular head of the American Federation of Labor, an organization embracing probably four millions of men and women. He and I both have at heart the welfare of all laboring classes, whether they are in our employ or not, and I, as one American citizen, shall be glad to confer with him, as another American citizen, upon any subject relating to their welfare, to the end that just wages may be paid, proper hours fixed, and laboring conditions improved where improvement is required.' Looking at the subject wholly from the standpoint of the corporation, it would have proven of immense advantage to have gone at least that far. Certainly, in the eyes of the great public, which must always be taken into consideration in determining labor controversies, it would have presented a better appearance.

"The Committee on Education and Labor in their recent investigation of conditions in the steel industry found the average wages in July, 1919, to be $6.27 per day, the wages of unskilled labor for a 10-hour day, $4.62 per day, which was the lowest-paid wages.

"On the other hand, Judge Gary testified that 34.8 per cent of the Steel Corporation's men worked 8 hours, 39.40 per cent worked 10 hours, 26.52 per cent 12 hours. Certainly these long hours ought not to be permitted.

"In the opinion of the committee, '* * * broadly speaking, the employees in the steel industry at the time of the strike were fairly well satisfied with the wages received, and that such question was not persuasive at all in any consideration of a strike.'

"The committee further found that the underlying cause of the strike was the determination of the American Federation of Labor to organize the steel workers in opposition to the known and long-established policy of the steel company against unionization.

"I think it a fair deduction from a careful study of the report of the committee that while some of the conditions under which the men worked should be improved, it was the demand from without the steel industry rather than from within that brought on the strike.

"The organization of the steel mills was begun under a resolution adopted at the St. Paul convention of the American Federation of Labor in June, 1918. The campaign for membership was begun under John Fitzpatrick, president of the Chicago Federation of Labor, an extremist, and William Z. Foster, a syndicalist and an I. W. W. In May, 1919, they claimed a membership in the Pittsburgh and Calumet districts of 80,000 men. In June, 1919, Mr. Fitzpatrick reported that there were 100,000 men in the organization.

"Messrs. Fitzpatrick and Foster thought the time was ripe for a strike, though the President of the United States had called for an industrial conference to consider industrial conditions and pleaded that the order for the strike be delayed until after this conference. Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, indorsed the President's plea for delay. John Fitzpatrick, William Z. Foster, and their associates, refused to comply with the request of Mr. Gompers or with the pleadings of the President.

"Mr. Gompers could not persuade the men to follow his judgment. This fact in itself is a confession that the radicals had control of the American Federation.

"It involved not only the United States Steel Corporation but the independent mills as well. The men who called the strike were in large part foreigners who were unnaturalized, but they counted in carrying out the purposes which John Fitzpatrick and William Z. Foster had in mind, namely, to dominate and control the labor situation and make the entire industrial country subject to their dictation.

"I do not want to be understood as being opposed to labor unions. I believe in them; but while I believe in unionism, I do not intend thereby to approve everything which is done in the name of union labor. If I were a laboring man I would be a union man; but as I would claim to exercise my own judgment in joining and affiliating with the union, so I would accord the same privilege to every other man to join the union or not, as he saw fit. That is the inherent right of every American citizen, and we cease to respond to the spirit of Americanism in so far as we attempt to deny this right to any other living man.

"Whether the steel strike was justified in an effort to better the conditions of workingmen I shall not further discuss, but of this I am convinced: That it ought to have been settled.

"If we are to look at it solely from the standpoint of the laboring man, what has he gained or what will he gain by this strike, which was arbitrarily called by the committee having it in charge in violation not only of the judgment and request of the titular head of the American Federation of Labor but in violation of the pleadings of the President of the United States, who on his bed of sickness begged these men to defer the strike in the interest of 110,000,000 Americans until after the meeting of the industrial conference which was soon to be held in Washington?

"The steel strike began September 22. Government statisticians estimate that the daily average of men on strike during 70 days was something like 100,000.

"The average daily wage during 1918 was—

Republic Iron & Steel Co	$5.17
United States Steel Corporation	5.33
Lackawanna Iron & Steel Co	5.45
Bethlehem Steel Co	5.68

"Estimating the daily wage of the strikers at $5 per day and the average number of strikers for 70 days—the period of the strike up until November 30—at 100,000 men, the total loss to the strikers will amount to $35,000,000.

"This is not all. It means a loss to the Nation of practically 7,000,000 days' work in the steel industry since the strike began. Those 7,000,000 days are lost and can never be converted into productive effort for humanity.

"Certainly the great Government of the United States, representing 110,000,000 people, has the right to say that questions of wage and of working conditions shall be adjusted by some modern method, perhaps not yet devised, which will prevent these awful catastrophes.

"When the men who are engaged in industrial life shall study these problems from the standpoint of citizenship, rather than from the narrow viewpoint of selfish ambitions and antagonisms, they will have a higher conception of life, improve the social fabric of the Nation, and at the same time promote their own material welfare.

"What method should be adopted for the adjustment of labor disputes in private industry is the problem. If the representatives of employers and of employees become more tolerant of the views and the rights of each other, as well as of the great third party—the public—many seeming difficulties will disappear.

"Though I am convinced that there have been very few strikes which have inured to the benefit of the workingman and very few lockouts which have benefited the employer, I at the same time feel that it would be unwise, if not impossible, to pass legislation penalizing strikes or lockouts in private industry; but the time is coming when public opinion will compel the adjustment of these difficulties without resorting to methods which are of little, if any, benefit to the respective parties, and always a positive detriment to the public.

"There are partial remedies which, in my judgment, may be very helpful.

"First. Require compulsory investigations and reports by fair and impartial tribunals upon all disputes affecting wages or labor conditions before either a strike or a lockout is permitted.

"Second. Provide for the Americanization of the foreigner who seeks the advantages of this country.

"Third. Penalize the agitator or organizer who preaches revolution or Bolshevism in any form.

"Fourth. Vacate the naturalization of any man who violates the laws of good citizenship.

COAL STRIKE.

"No strike within a generation was more uncalled for than the coal strike.

"Late in September when the people of the country were seeking to get their winter's coal supply and industry was taking practically all the coal that the mines produce, and the miners in the bituminous region were earning from $5 to $20 per day, and more, if they worked, their delegates in convention passed resolutions terminating the wage scales, which had been approved by the Government, demanded a five-day week, a six-hour day, and a 60 per cent increase in their wages, and at the same time authorized the international officials to call a general strike of all of the bituminous mine workers throughout the United States, to become effective November 1, 1919, unless these new demands were granted.

"I want to acquit the miners of being responsible for these demands. They were the demands of radicals and of ambitious officers, many of whom, in my judgment, were little more concerned for the benefit of the miners than they were for the public.

"For the month of October the Government statisticians estimate the labor cost of the coal mined at approximately $84,000,000. For November the figure will be somewhere near $28,500,000. This indicates that the mine workers as a class will receive $55,500,000 less for services rendered during the month of November than during the month of October—all because they have been induced by their leaders to strike.

"If we count 25 working days for November and estimate the number of striking miners to be in the same ratio to the total number of miners—400,000—as the decrease in the wage cost of coal mined in November is to the total wage cost of the coal mined in October, then there have been lost to the miners and to the public approximately 6,500,000 days of work. Consider for a moment its effect upon the public welfare!

"Every reasoning man wants the miner not only to have a fair wage but a good wage and good working conditions. Dr. Garfield, after investigation, says their wages should be increased 14 per cent. But what principle of either public or private morals will permit the officers or the men, in pursuance of a common conspiracy, to stop the mining of bituminous coal of which we must have 500,000,000 tons a year?

"Must transportation stop?

"Must the wheels of industry cease to turn?

"Must men, women, and children freeze and starve while the leaders of the miners take advantage of the approaching winter season to strike and force increased and unreasonable demands?

"Must 110,000,000 Americans submit to all the distress and inconvenience consequent upon the failure of fuel supply when the hills are full of coal?

"Or shall they by orderly process and by the hand of the Government which they have devised say to the 400,000 miners, 'You shall not thus threaten the life of industry and the health of your fellow men.'

"And then, gentlemen, just contemplate the situation: Because the Government sees fit to invoke the aid of the courts to enforce the law of the land certain men both in and out of Congress declare for the impeachment of the judge who heard the case and entered the decree which compelled the officials of the miners' organization to withdraw the call for the strike. And all this is said before an appeal from the decision of the court is taken.

"Must Government control this conflict, or shall this conflict control Government?

"It is sufficient to say that 110,000,000 free Americans are not living in Russia, and they will not be terrorized by the methods of Trotsky, a Lenine, or a Lewis. If these would-be autocrats are not conscious of the intensity of the bitter feeling against their methods, let them go out along the highways and byways, or in the cities and towns, and inquire of the public, 'What say you?'

"The American people did not hesitate to raise an army of 4,000,000 men or to send 2,000,000 of them more than 3,000 miles across the seas to help destroy the imperial autocracy of Germany, and they will see to it in an orderly and legal way that the would-be autocrats of this country—whether they represent capital or whether they represent labor—shall not dominate or compel 110,000,000 people to do their bidding.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

"It will be inferred from what I have heretofore said that I distinguish between strikes which occur in manufacturing, mining, or other forms of private industry and strikes which occur in interstate commerce and affect our railway or other transportation, and as I distinguish between these strikes, so I would differentiate the remedies to be adopted.

"The reason lies in the inherent differences in the functions to be performed. In private industry any strike or lockout in mine or factory, no matter how important it may be to the particular locality, its effect is more or less circumscribed. It may even constitute a substantial part of a given industry, and still it seldom happens that it could be regarded as nation wide.

"Again, it must be borne in mind that the Congress has plenary jurisdiction in dealing with interstate commerce, while its authority over intrastate or local industry is very limited. Let us consider the nation-wide aspect of our interstate commerce.

"The value of the manufactured products, according to the last census of manufactures, taken in 1914, was $24,246,434,724. Taking into consideration increased production and higher values, it is quite likely that the product of the current year is very materially greater than it was in 1914.

"The value of the mineral products in 1918 was $5,526,162,000. The value of farm products for 1918 was $21,386,000,000. Our foreign trade for the calendar year 1918—imports and exports—amounted to $9,180,300,255. During the current year it will amount to much more.

"Nearly all these products enter in one form or another into interstate or foreign commerce, or both. It affects intimately the livelihood and comfort of every man, woman, and child in the country. If a controversy should arise between the railroads—whether under Government or private control—and the railway brotherhoods over wages or hours or working conditions, or for any other reason, it is within the power of 2,000,000 railroad men, or even of the membership of any one of the four brotherhoods, at any time to bring to a standstill the entire commerce of the country, foreign and domestic. There are about 85,000 locomotive engineers. They alone could stop all transportation.

"Should this happen the food supplies of our fertile farms could not be moved to the markets. Fuel could not be hauled from the mine to the family fireside, the boiler, or the furnace. The raw material could not be moved to the mills. The finished product could not be marketed. Industry would be paralyzed. In 10 days' time, and less, the innocent men, women, and children, including the families of the strikers themselves, living in the centers of our great cities would be on the verge of starvation, while the food products in the rural sections of the country would be wasting and rotting.

"And if I may say a word concerning the financial aspect of railway securities:

"According to the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission on December 31, 1917, there were 627,930 stockholders, individual and institutional.

"The railroads are capitalized at approximately $20,000,000,000. Their valuation is estimated to be between seventeen and twenty billions.

"The National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities is my authority for the statement that there are probably some 7,500,000 institutional and individual holders of American railroad bonds. About 30 per cent of these railroad bonds are owned by the life and fire insurance companies and mutual savings banks of the country to protect the funds of their policyholders and depositors.

"I am informed that 30,000,000 people own 46,000,000 life insurance policies now outstanding, and that one-fourth of the securities for the payment of these policies is invested in railroad securities. Six hundred and forty-nine millions of these securities are held by fire and marine insurance, casualty and surety companies. Three hundred and fifty millions are owned by benevolent associations, charitable institutions, colleges, and schools. Trust companies and State and National banks own six hundred and eighty-five millions.

"It must follow, therefore, that anything which seriously affects the operations of these railroads will have a corresponding effect upon all the financial and insurance institutions of the country, and every widow or orphan or other individual who may be a holder or beneficiary of these securities.

"These apprehensions are not mere figments of the imagination. At different times nation-wide strikes have been threatened. Within a few days a strike was called by certain branches of the railway employees at St. Louis. Threats of nation-wide strikes have been made by leaders in the councils of the brotherhoods. Even Congress has been told that there would be revolution if their demands were not granted.

"Shall the Congress of the United States, whose duty it is to legislate for 110,000,000 of people, get down on their knees in the face of threats of this kind and say, 'We are powerless to act'? We will not do it if we are men.

ATTITUDE OF SOME LABOR LEADERS.

"As indicating the attitude of some of the labor leaders bearing upon this subject, Mr. Glenn Plumb in presenting his plan suggested certain wage boards and boards of adjustment, which, he said (Friday, February 7, 1919), 'would provide a means of settling wage questions and other disputes in such a manner that the occasion for strikes or lockouts would be effectually removed.'

"But, on February 12, 1919, in answer to a question by Senator CUMMINS, 'And are you willing, if the Government operates the properties, that you, the men, shall be denied the privilege or right which you now exercise of striking?' Mr. Garrettson, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors, replied, 'I am not. I believe that right should and of necessity must and absolutely will continue.'

"When Mr. Gompers was before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, September 23, 1919, testifying concerning the antistrike provisions of the Cummins bill, he said—hearings, page 44—'The effect of this bill, were it enacted into law, would not be to prevent strikes, it would simply create lawbreakers. I am free to say to you, gentlemen, that if a bill of this character were enacted into law, I should have no more hesitancy in participating in a just strike than I would now, regardless of what the consequences might be.' He added at the time, in substance, that he would not hesitate to refuse to comply with the law if enacted, and he would not hesitate to advise his fellows to refuse to comply with the law.

"These latter statements were, however, stricken from the record on revision of the transcript of the testimony. In any event, they do not appear in the printed testimony.

"So we have this warning: If the Congress shall attempt, by legislation, to protect the American people from a strike involving the entire interstate commerce of the country it will be defied.

"I can not speak for others, but as for me, when men representing any interest, I care not what, come before the Congress of a sovereign people with suggestions that they will not comply with a law if it is passed, they overstep the bounds of propriety, and they weaken rather than strengthen their cause. All men have the right to petition or to remonstrate. No man has the right to threaten or intimidate.

"We are told that if this law should be enacted the conservative element of the brotherhoods would not be able to hold in check the radical element. And they refer to unauthorized or illegal strikes—that is, strikes not in conformity with the rules of the organization—as being evidence of their inability to control at all times. If they are not able to control their own men, shall the Government of the United States cower before the men they can not control? Not if America knows herself, and America does know herself.

"No labor leader will admit that he ever called a strike to enforce an unjust demand. He certainly can not claim the right to make any demand, just or unjust, and insist upon its being granted. If his claim is just, he ought to believe that any impartial tribunal created by the Government will grant it. Public opinion will compel it.

"The duty of good citizenship demands that if employer and employee can not adjust their differences, they should be submitted to a proper tribunal for decision, rather than that an entire industry should be suspended while they continue to quarrel.

"When the brotherhoods engaged in interstate commerce claim the inalienable and unconditional right to strike, they claim the right to starve and freeze the public unless their disputes are settled to their satisfaction.

THE CUMMINS BILL.

"Now, briefly, what are the labor provisions of the Cummins bill relating to strikes?

"In the first place, while considering these provisions, let it be borne in mind that under this bill the employees and the public are to be given representation on the board of directors of the several railroad companies, so they always will be informed as to all the operations of the railway companies, whether of an economical or financial character.

"In view of past experience and present industrial unrest, the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate believed that the Congress, representing the public, wanted to be just not only to the railway employees but to the companies, their stockholders, and bondholders as well, and, above all, they believed that they should not be unmindful of the great public whose servants the Members of Congress are.

"Being confirmed in this belief, they proposed a method of settling disputes and controversies which can not be adjusted under any provision of present law, or by any other plan which the men and the companies may themselves devise; and if these disputes can not be settled by any of these means we create a committee of wages and working conditions and three regional boards of adjustment. The Interstate Commerce Committee recognizes the right of the railroad companies and their employees to settle their disputes by present known methods of conciliation, mediation, or arbitration, or by any other method they can agree upon. It is only when all these means fail that the machinery of the Cummins bill is to be set in motion.

"The committee of wages and working conditions is composed of eight members—four to represent labor and four to represent the carriers. This committee is selected by the transportation board of five members appointed by the President. The employee members of the committee are chosen by the transportation board from nominations made by the railway craftsmen. The four members representing the carriers are selected in like manner by this board from nominations made by the carriers themselves. This committee has jurisdiction over controversies respecting wages and working conditions and to hear appeals from regional boards where those boards are evenly divided and unable to reach a decision by a majority vote. It is likewise empowered to interpret its findings and to make rules and regulations for its procedure, including the procedure on appeal cases from the regional boards of adjustment, and is required to consider and decide all complaints respecting wages and working conditions as promptly as practicable. This committee on wages and working conditions considers all complaints. Its decisions are subject to approval by the transportation board. If the committee is evenly divided the subject of the dispute shall be referred to the board, whose decision shall be final.

"The regional boards of adjustment, three in number, shall be empowered to hear and determine all complaints, grievances, matters, and disputes, including questions of discipline and controversies arising in ordinary railway operations, other than controversies relating to wages and working conditions.

"What plan could be fairer?

"Which is of the more importance, the uninterrupted movement of commerce or a commerce which is subject to paralysis at any time there is a quarrel between the railroad managers and the chiefs of the brotherhoods?

"It would be wrong to deny the right to strike or to lockout if a tribunal were not provided to which should be submitted the subject matter of dispute.

"We simply say to these men, 'Settle your differences in any way you can, and we hope you can settle them; but if you are not able to agree then the welfare of the public requires you to submit your evidence to the different tribunals we have created for investigation and decision.'

"I submit that if the railway brotherhoods are not willing to trust fair tribunals to decide their controversies the people of the United States can not, in the interests of safety, trust their commerce to men who will not trust them.

"The Cummins bill makes carriers and officers liable to a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, if they knowingly refuse to obey the decision of the committee on wages and working conditions, when approved by the board, or of the board in cases referred to it.

"The bill also provides that it shall be unlawful for two or more persons, whether they are officers, directors, managers, agents, attorneys, or employees of any carrier, to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement and with like purpose substantially to hinder, restrain or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce; and the violation of this section is punishable by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

"It is expressly provided that nothing in the act shall deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

"Likewise it penalizes anyone who with like intent aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures the commission or performance of any of the acts declared to be unlawful by the provisions which I have heretofore referred to.

"The cause of good government, the welfare of the people, require these disputes to be settled or decided by a public tribunal without the interruption of the country's business; and I am satisfied if this system is tried out it will be approved by the railway men themselves.

"This is not denying the principle of collective bargaining. I believe in collective bargaining. But I would add a corollary: Collective bargaining does not mean collective dictation, whether by capital or by labor. The public alone can dictate. No individual or class has a right to dictate to the public.

"The Government at Washington lives, and it says to all elements of society, 'You shall be free to work out your own salvation so long, and so long only, as you do not unduly interfere with the rights and privileges of your fellow men.'

"There must be no supermen and no superclasses in America. All must be equal before the law. All must do unto others as they would be done by."

H. R. 10918. An act to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENYON. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed the speech begun by him on Tuesday. After having spoken for two hours,

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] would like to submit a few observations this afternoon, and if it would not disturb the Senator from Wisconsin I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum. Then, upon a quorum being called, the Senator from Tennessee will submit some observations, and afterwards the Senator from Wisconsin may proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As that will give me an opportunity to get a bite of lunch, I will acquiesce in the arrangement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Johnson, S. Dak.	Moses	Smoot
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Myers	Spencer
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	New	Stanley
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Nugent	Sutherland

Gay	Lodge	Shields	Wolcott
Harris	McCormick	Simmons
Harrison	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to set aside the railroad bill to take up the sugar bill at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the railroad bill is the unfinished business before the Senate. It would require unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not unanimous consent, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Can not that be done by an ordinary motion? I think it is in order at any time to make a motion to take it up.

Mr. SMOOT. It would displace the unfinished business if that were done.

Mr. NORRIS. It would if the sugar bill is not disposed of before we adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not see the chairman of the committee here right now, but as soon as he comes in I will see whether or not it can be done. I will wait until he comes in before making the motion.

Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McLean	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	Myers	Sterling
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	New	Trammell
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Walsh, Mont.

Dial	Kellogg	Overman	Watson
Elkins	King	Page	Wolcott
Fernald	Lenroot	Pomerene
Gay	McCormick	Ransdell
Gronna	McKellar	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCORMICK in the chair). Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There being no quorum present, the Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. SMOOT answered to their names when called.

Mr. HARDING, Mr. MOSES, Mr. KEYES, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. UNDERWOOD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. Is the Senator from Tennessee going to continue?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am willing to defer my remarks in order that we may have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words about the amendment before it is voted on. I offered that amendment Tuesday, and at that time I made some remarks upon it, but it was late in the day, just before the hour of adjournment, and there were very few Senators present at that time. As there is a much larger attendance now than usual, I will make a few further remarks, in brief explanation of the pending amendment.

The amendment is designed to take out of the bill the provision that would put on the board of directors of each railroad which incorporates under this measure two employees of the railroad and two directors from the public. It is rank paternalism, and I can not see any use of it or anything to be gained by it. If it would serve any good purpose I might be willing to see it remain in the bill, but when I can see no good purpose in it I do not like to see a feature of paternalism like that stay in the bill.

All in which railway employees are interested is getting adequate wages and having fair working conditions, and that is provided for, amply provided for, by other features of the bill. There is provision for a number of regional boards on wages and working conditions and for a commission on wages and working conditions, to which an appeal may be taken from a regional board, and if the board and the commission can not adjust matters of wages and working conditions then a dispute goes to the transportation board, and there it is disposed of before a fair and impartial public tribunal, acting in a judicial capacity. So the employees are amply taken care of by those provisions, and why should we go out of our way to provide that on the board of directors of each railroad corporation two of the directors shall be employees of the corporation, whether they own any stock or not, and two of them shall be taken from the public, whether they own any stock or not. It is anomalous; it is unheard of. It is the universal rule that the directors of a corporation must be stockholders, men who are pecuniarily interested in the management of its affairs, interested in making a success of it. It is right that they should be taken from among the men who have put up their money to finance the corporation and conduct its business.

Suppose there are no employees who are stockholders, what are you going to do? Take two men who have no pecuniary interest and are not stockholders and make them directors and take from among the public two others who own no stock and make them directors? I think it is the intention of the provision to take from the public two men who own no stock in the railroad and make them directors. I suppose if men were stockholders they would not be considered fair and impartial in representing the public. This provision of the bill is an anomaly, and I can see no object in it. I suppose it was probably intended as a sop to the employees; but while I was not present at the committee meeting at which this provision was discussed by representatives of the railroad brotherhoods, I understand representatives of the brotherhoods appeared before the committee and said they did not want this provision, did not want any representation of employees on the boards of directors. I have heard members of the committee who were present say that statement was made to the committee by representatives of the brotherhoods. Then why should it be forced upon them?

I can see no good reason whatever for it. I am a believer in the good old Anglo-Saxon doctrine that people who own a business have a right to manage and conduct it. That is somewhat old-fashioned, but I do not believe we should get entirely away from it. I believe the people who put money into a business and own the business have a right to conduct that business, and if it be engaged in interstate commerce, let them conduct it, if you please, under the supervision of the Federal Government, under laws enacted by Congress, under supervision and regulation of Federal agencies; but let the owners do the conducting, subject to control by the Federal Government.

I tell you we are these days going so far into paternalism and Federal interference in private business and private property rights that we are getting entirely away from the theory on which this Government was founded. I believe this provision would be an unwarranted interference in the right of private property, for which there is no excuse whatever.

Is there any Member of this body who owns a ranch, a farm, or a plantation who would think it right for his employees to be made directors of his property and given a voice in saying how his property should be managed? Of course, he should conduct it according to law, and if he undertakes to conduct it in contravention of law let him be held responsible for it. But within the scope and bounds of law he should be allowed to conduct his business as he may see fit and according to his judgment. I think this provision of the bill unnecessary, unwise, unbusinesslike, and unwarranted, and therefore I offered an amendment to strike it out, and I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is somewhat discouraging to me, as I am sure it must be to the Senator from Montana, to argue a question of this character in the presence of so few Senators, who must ultimately decide it. I have done my best to secure the attendance of Senators. I have done my best to impress upon them the vast importance and tremendous consequences of legislation upon the railroads of the United States, but apparently with very little success. I am driven, however, to reply to the Senator from Montana, even though the Senators who will decide the merits of the amendment which he has offered do not hear the arguments either for it or against it.

Mr. President, the provisions which are attacked by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana are indispensable parts of the general arrangement which the bill contemplates respecting the relations between employer and employee. The bill provides that every corporation organized under the bill to operate a railway, and every corporation reorganized under the bill to operate or own a railway, shall have upon its board of directors at all times at least two directors who are selected by the classified employees of the corporation, and at least two directors who are appointed by the President, as I remember it, upon the recommendation of the transportation board. At any rate, they represent the Government of the United States upon the directorates of these corporations.

I think none of us can be insensible to the great movement that is sweeping over the world for better relations between employers and employees. That movement in its essence is a participation upon the part of employees or workers in the management of the enterprise in which they are engaged. It is not for a control in the management, for so long as the enterprise is one in which private capital is invested I think we all agree that the control of the corporation must remain with the owners of the capital invested in the corporation. I mean that control which is permitted to private interests. I do not mean that control which is reserved for and exercised by the Government, either State or Federal.

I think most of the students of this question recognize the value of conference, the value of frankness, and the value of information in conducting a great business like a railroad or any private enterprise of considerable magnitude.

The Senator from Montana says that we have other provisions in the bill which confer upon impartial tribunals the authority to adjust or adjudicate any dispute between employers and employees. That is true; but I would look upon provisions of that kind as almost futile unless we do everything in our power to create good feeling between the employers and employees, confidence on both sides, and do everything we can to prevent the disputes which the Government assumes the obligation of adjudicating.

The presence of these directors, and I am speaking now of directors representing employees, upon boards of directors is to prevent the differences which arise and which heretofore have gradually ripened into strikes and violence and other methods of composing industrial disputes.

I think it is the universal observation of those who have looked into the matter and the experience of all who have put this plan into execution—and there are a great many industrial enterprises which have put this suggestion into execution, in substance—if the affairs of the corporation to be managed can be discussed and debated, all its difficulties and all its dangers, all its hopes and all its operations discussed in the presence of and with the assistance of the employees of the corporation, a great many controversies which become very serious and which do disturb the peace and quiet of industry and of society will be avoided.

We have come into an era where there must be this interchange of opinion between employers and employees. The employee must have his opportunity to assert his views on a particular subject before it crystallizes in the form of an acrimonious dispute.

I do not intend to enlarge upon the subject, because it is a part of the literature of the age. All of us know what has been done in this respect and what those who have studied the subject most deeply hope will come from a reorganization, if you please, of this character.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that corporations of this character, especially under the provisions of the bill—that is, corporations that are public utilities and are controlled as railroads will be controlled under the bill—should be differentiated, with respect to the wage boards of which the Senator is speaking, from the corporations to which he just referred, industrial corporations owned and operated by private individuals.

I can readily see that employees who are working for the Jones Manufacturing Co. could with propriety have a voice upon any board appointed to settle the controversies between them, and that the corporation and the employees should create a board composed of employees and of representatives of the corporation for the purpose of determining any controversy respecting wages; but does not the Senator think there is a difference between corporations of that character and these public corporations? In this case, if the board determines that the wages should be increased it does not affect the corporation. The corporation does not have to bear the burden. It comes out of the public.

It occurs to me, and the criticism has been made in my presence by labor men, as well as by those interested in corporations, that the public interest would be lost sight of; that the representatives of the railroads and the representatives of the employees are more concerned in getting together than they are in determining the rate; and that the railroad employers would too quickly concede the demands of labor, because the public would not be concerned in the controversy; that is to say, the public would not be interested, and the public would ultimately have to bear the burden.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I tried to suggest to the Senator from Utah, I think yesterday or the day before, when a dispute arises, then the public will be represented. But I can not concede that a railroad corporation is any more likely to yield to an unjust demand on the part of labor because there happens to be upon its board of directors two men who represent labor. It is not intended to control wages. It is intended to preserve good feeling between the employer and the employee. It is intended to prevent the constant and irritating conflicts which have so disturbed American life within the last few years.

I realize that if railway companies should attempt to pay their employees an excessive compensation, so excessive as to be obviously wrong, and if the transportation board, which is given jurisdiction over the regional boards of adjustment, and the committee of wages and working conditions do not correct that evil, then we must take measures to correct it. Hitherto employers, whether in a public business or in a private business, have not been disposed to pay their employees excessive compensation. There is a perfectly natural motive which protects the public in that respect.

At any rate, this particular amendment does not, as it seems to me, reach the point suggested by the Senator from Utah. If we are to supervise the management of a corporation and see that its expenses are not too great, we must do it in some way. When I come to deal with that point as it was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I think I can point out in the bill a perfectly certain safeguard for the public in that respect. But I do not want in discussing the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to get into fields which have been occupied by other Senators.

I hope that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will not prevail, for it is perfectly evident that if it does prevail the antistrike provisions in the bill would lose many supporters which they now have, for I regard the general arrangement of the bill respecting labor as indissoluble. If one part of the arrangement is overthrown it would involve a readjustment of the entire bill in that respect. Of course, if it is wrong, if the employees ought not to be represented upon the board of directors in order that their relations may become more intimate and cordial with their employers, then the provisions of the bill in that respect ought to be eliminated; but otherwise they should remain as they are.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate temporarily lay aside the pending measure and proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3284) to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). In the opinion of the Chair there is no such motion as to temporarily lay aside a measure. The pending bill may be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, or the Senator can make the direct motion to proceed to the consideration of the other measure, which would displace the pending bill.

Mr. McNARY. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	Jones, Wash.	Myers
Bankhead	Fletcher	Kellogg	New
Beckham	Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Norris
Brandegee	Gay	King	Overman
Capper	Hale	Kirby	Page
Chamberlain	Harris	La Follette	Phipps
Colt	Harrison	Lenroot	Pomerene
Culberson	Hitchcock	Lodge	Ransdell
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	McKellar	Sheppard
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	McNary	Simmons

Smith, S. C.	Stanley	Trammell	Walsh, Mass.
Smoot	Sterling	Underwood	Watson
Spencer	Thomas	Wadsworth	Wolcott

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] in attendance on a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is there a motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] whether he moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has sent to the desk, or whether he asked unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business?

Mr. MCNARY. I move that at this time the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 3284.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284, which is known as the sugar bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I desire to be heard.

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is debatable two hours after the Senate convenes, which time has arrived. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand the Chair rules that the motion of the Senator from Oregon is debatable after 1 o'clock, the Senate having met at 11 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Chair is right in that ruling. I very much hope that the motion of the Senator from Oregon will not prevail. I understand perfectly the exigency which lies behind the bill, to which the Senator from Oregon has referred. I wish it were possible that we could consider all of the important measures of legislation at the same time, but we can not. It is a matter for the Senate to determine whether, in its judgment, it is more important to enact legislation for the further regulation and control of our railways and preliminary to their return to their owners than it is to enact the legislation to which the Senator from Oregon refers.

I have done all I could during all the time that the pending bill has been before the Senate, and even before then, to impress upon the Senate the importance of this legislation, and I intend to do all I can to keep the bill before the Senate until it is disposed of.

I suggest to those who are in favor of bringing on the so-called sugar bill that we hold a night session in order to dispose of that measure. I perfectly understand that after a bill of the character of the railroad bill is considered all day it ought not, except in the last extremity, to be considered at a night session, but that is no reason why Senators should not assemble here for the purpose of debating and determining another measure, which I have no doubt is of great importance, although I do not understand the measure sufficiently to be able to express an opinion upon it. All that I say now, Mr. President, is that I think it would be wrong and would be a desertion of duty to lay aside the railroad bill for the purpose of taking up any other legislation that is on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in the passage of the so-called sugar bill. I think it ought to be passed at an early day; to be passed in time to go to the other House to be acted on there; but I think it would be a great mistake to lay aside the pending bill. If the pending measure is kept before the Senate all the time, it will not be long until we get through with its discussion. It seems to me that that would be the orderly method of procedure. So far as the railroad bill is concerned, it affects the business and the people of this country to as great an extent as any sugar bill could ever affect them. It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that I shall vote against taking up the sugar bill.

I desire to express the opinion, however, that Senators should remain in their seats and listen to the discussion of the railroad bill and not have quorums called every half hour. We have had four such calls, as I remember, this morning. Every one of them takes considerable time, sometimes as much as 15 or 20 minutes. The result is a loss of time. It is about time, it seems to me, that Senators should be in the Chamber and that the pending bill should be considered and finally acted upon just as quickly as possible.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that the reason why no more interest is taken in the railroad bill is because Senators are so dissatisfied with it that they have no desire to do anything to expedite its passage?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so, Mr. President. That, however, could be developed if we should take a vote upon the bill; and I think that is what we ought to do. I think we should vote upon all of the amendments to the bill, and upon the bill itself, at the very earliest possible date. If Senators will attend the sessions, when the time comes when amendments are to be offered and discussed, and the effect they will have upon the bill is developed, it can be determined what the sentiment of the Senate is.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. If, as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], Senators are dissatisfied with the pending bill, that is the greater reason why they should be here. If Senators approve the bill, it is presumed that it will be passed; but there is no excuse for Senators not being present during the consideration of a bill that vitally affects the constituency of every Member of the Senate if they believe that it is not a good bill or that it ought to be amended and improved. If they so believe, that is a greater reason why Senators should be here. Now is the time and here is the opportunity to make any changes in the bill. A bill reported by a committee is merely a tentative measure. This bill may be amended in any way that a majority of the Senate sees fit to amend it, but it can not be amended by absentees.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that I will gladly join him in an effort to recess to-night until 7.30 or 8 o'clock in order to take up the sugar bill, with the distinct understanding that that bill alone is to be considered at the evening session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not believe there is any attempt on the part of anyone unnecessarily to interfere with the consideration of the railroad bill. There are those who are opposed to it and those who are in favor of it who think we ought to consider the so-called sugar bill. Unless we do consider that measure now or within the next day or so, at the furthest, it will be useless to take it up and consider it at all. That is not true of the railroad bill. The country will live if the railroad bill is not passed through the Senate to-morrow or within the next few days. We all know that it is going to conference when it does pass and that the conferees will write the bill.

The American people are all interested in both of these measures—that is true—but unless one of them is enacted at once there can be no relief. In 30 days from now, if we do not legislate on the subject of sugar, we will hear from the country in a way that will not be very agreeable. We are just at the place now where sugar is going to go out of sight for all who are not wealthy and the speculators will reap their harvest.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator would say in that connection that if sugar goes out of sight, it will not be on account of the producers of sugar in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator now, and I want the country to understand, that the beet-sugar producers of this country do not want sugar to advance beyond a certain price.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator; at least so far as I know there are no beet-sugar producers who are trying to prevent the enactment of the sugar legislation. If they are, I have not heard of it. But whether they are or not, it does not affect the proposition——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to make another suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. We can not get away from the proposition that some legislation is necessary if we want to save this country and the people from paying prices for sugar that will be absolutely abnormal. I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah says that the beet-sugar producers do not want to see sugar advanced in price. I say for all the consumers of sugar in the United States that they do not want to see sugar advanced. Then, who is interested in seeing the price of sugar advanced?

Mr. NORRIS. If it is true—and I am inclined to think it is—that the consumer does not want it advanced, and, so far as I know, the beet-sugar producers have not made any attempt to advance it, then why not pass legislation to prevent it from being advanced?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct in that position; but I wish to say in answer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] that there are people in the United States who want the price of sugar advanced, namely, the middle men who will handle it, the profiteers. When the people of the United States begin to pay 15 or 16 or 17 cents a pound for their sugar, it will be because of profiteering in this country.

Mr. KIRBY. They are paying 20 cents a pound for it in some sections now.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are paying 20 cents for it in my State to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. And the price may go as high as 25 cents. There are some Senators who say that because the railroad bill is the unfinished business we ought not to displace it, and that we ought to adjourn in the afternoon, instead of taking a recess, and pass the sugar bill in the morning hour. There are a few Senators—I think they are very few—who are bitterly opposed to the passage of the sugar bill, and if they can see the hand of the clock approaching the hour of 2 they might be induced to make an extraordinary effort to prolong the debate, knowing that when 2 o'clock arrives the sugar bill will have to be laid aside for the unfinished business. In my judgment, if the sugar bill is taken up so that there is no limit ahead, and it is known that it is going to be considered to a finish, the discussion will not last two hours, and we can then go back and take up the railroad bill and dispose of it.

Mr. President, I desire to meet another suggestion which has been made, namely, the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], along the same line of the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that we take a recess after 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, and take up the sugar bill at an evening session. I would be perfectly willing to do that if there were any assurance that at 8 o'clock we would be able to pass the bill. I do not believe there would be a quorum here at 8 o'clock, but I think we would fool away the entire evening getting a quorum; and even if there were a quorum, knowing that next morning we were going to take up the railroad bill, it would be known that all that would be necessary to defeat the sugar bill would be to prolong the debate a little, and that of itself would defeat it.

The sugar bill must pass the House after it passes the Senate. It must become a law before the Congress takes a holiday recess if it is going to be effective. Every day of delay is dangerous, because the power to buy the Cuban crop is getting more remote every hour, and delay is dangerous. That is not true of the railroad bill; and it seems to me Senators ought to be willing to lay it aside without any limit ahead, so that those who are opposed to the sugar bill will know that prolonged debate will not bring about its defeat, and then there will be no unnecessary debate. I would not want to prevent any man who is opposed to it from taking any reasonable length of time to debate it. We are late now with this sugar legislation. Those who listened to the address yesterday of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] can see why we are late. We are in a dilemma that we ought not to be in now with regard to sugar, but that is water that has passed over the wheel. We are confronted now with a condition that demands solution at once if we are going to do any good for the country. It is immaterial who is going to make money or how much they are going to make. It is generally conceded that sugar is going to go up in price and that it is not necessary for it to go up if we take the proper steps and remedy the errors that have been committed in the past and that have gotten us into this predicament.

It seems to me that we are perfectly consistent when we ask to take up this bill under those circumstances. There is not any object to interfere unnecessarily with the consideration of the railroad bill. The interference that will take place is not intended as a blow at that legislation, and we will soon get back to it. The difference, when you get down to it, in a nutshell, is that one piece of legislation must be enacted immediately if it is to do any good, while if the other is delayed for a week nothing serious will happen.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. With the Senator's permission, I should like to offer a suggestion.

The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce has in charge this railroad legislation. I am a member of that committee, and I feel the same very keen interest in the progress of the legislation that he does. I fully realize the importance of this sugar bill. I think it is very regrettable that something was not done by the Government several months ago to help out the sugar situation, but that has not been done. I realize that if we do not do something the increased price of sugar to the consumer during the coming year is going to be about half a billion dollars. I realize that if this legislation is not passed it is going to cost the Treasury of the United States some three or four hundred million dollars to continue the experiment of Government operation.

Now, I was going to suggest that we ask the chairman of the committee to consent to an adjournment to-night with the understanding that we can take up the sugar bill during the morning hour to-morrow, and let us proceed with it and see if we can not dispose of it during the morning hour. I think it ought to be disposed of during the morning hour, and it will be disposed of if we consider this matter from the standpoint of the entire country; and if the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, and we have not disposed of the sugar bill, the Senate in its wisdom can then determine what should be done.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio is taking a very patriotic view of the matter, but I do not believe he was in the Chamber when I explained why it seemed to me that less expedition would be had if we tried to pass the sugar bill in the morning hour than if we should take it up in this way.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get through, first, with the Senator from Ohio. As I suggested, I will say to the Senator from Ohio it seemed to me that if we took up the sugar bill in the morning hour, those who are opposed to it might be induced to prolong the debate and the consideration of it, knowing that it would be automatically displaced at 2 o'clock. If we did pass it in the morning hour, it would take just as long then as it would take now. In my judgment we will not pass it in the morning hour, and, in my judgment, it will not take two hours to pass it if there is not any time ahead that will automatically displace the bill; and if we pass it to-day we could devote the time in the morning hour that we otherwise would have put on it to the consideration of the railroad bill. I should be very glad to do that. I should be glad to submit to any kind of a reasonable understanding, if we could reach it; but we ought to have, and we ought to have soon, we ought to have to-day, a final vote on that bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not willing to assume that Senators are going to debate even the sugar bill unnecessarily until I have an ocular demonstration of that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. When I say they will, I am saying that without any criticism. It is a common thing here. I have indulged in it myself, and I did not think I was doing anything wrong or dishonorable. I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am criticizing a man who is opposed to a bill because when he sees the hand of the clock within 30 minutes or 10 minutes or 5 minutes of 2 o'clock, when it is going to be automatically disposed of, he consumes time that he otherwise would not consume. I am not finding fault with the men that oppose it. They have a right to do that under the rules. It is something that is continually resorted to in this Chamber.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to see a quick solution of this matter. I am one of the Senators from Louisiana, and of course I am vitally interested in anything that is going to affect the interests of my State. The Senator will recollect, as he was at the hearings of the committee when we passed on this bill, that I offered an amendment restricting the powers proposed to be given by the bill to the purchase of foreign sugar. Now, everybody knows that we will have to purchase more than 50 per cent of foreign sugar——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator let me make the statement?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought not to make a speech in my time.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to make a speech in the Senator's time, but I want to make a suggestion which I think will be helpful to him.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; let us have it.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator will not permit it, of course I can not make it in his time, but I am going to offer something which I think will help the Senator out.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is this: I suggest that we agree to restrict the terms of this bill to foreign sugar, which the Senator from Oregon admits controls the situation. We can not get the sugar that we will need unless we can buy the Cuban sugar; and if we can buy two or two and a half million tons of Cuban sugar, that certainly will be more than 50 per cent of the consumption, and will control the situation. Let us restrict it to foreign sugar, and you will find no objection from the Louisiana Senators on that point—and, so far as I know, they are the only ones who are opposing this measure in its present form—and you can put it through.

If, however, you attempt to apply the terms of this bill to the domestic article, to single out sugar and say we must buy sugar, and we must control sugar, and not control meat, not control the other articles of commerce, not control innumerable things that the American people need, we would be compelled to debate that; and I think you will find other people besides the Senators from Louisiana debating such a departure from what I conceive to be the principles on which our Government is founded.

It is altogether different when you get outside. When you propose to go to a foreign land and buy anything that that foreign land has to sell us, let us do that, and you will find no opposition from the Louisiana people. We will take our chances in the open market; but we do not want the representatives of the Government sent down into our State to try to control our people in what they shall get for their product.

That is my suggestion—a simple amendment restricting this to foreign sugar. Put the word "foreign" before the word "sugar."

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say a word in reference to the suggestion. I think nineteen-twentieths of what the Senator has said has been an argument rather than a suggestion. He has suggested an amendment to which personally I am opposed. He may offer his amendment. If the Senate adopts it, it will be part of the law. I am not willing, even if I knew what all of those who favor the legislation favored, to make an agreement in advance in regard to a vital amendment to the bill; so I could not accept the Senator's suggestion. If I did accept it for myself it would not apply to anyone else.

My own judgment is that the failure to pass this legislation will result in an expense to the people of the United States of more than half a billion dollars, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio. I think it will approach a billion dollars. It will mean that a great many people will not be able to buy sugar at all, when, as a matter of fact, properly distributed, if we succeed in getting the Cuban crop, there will be sugar enough for all. In a nutshell, that is the condition.

It may be too late now to bring about a remedy. This legislation may fail partially. It will cost a lot more to do it now than it would have cost six weeks ago or three months ago, when it could have been done without any difficulty; and the danger is increasing every hour, Mr. President. Delay is extremely dangerous, and for that reason it seems to me that there ought to be no objection to taking up this bill and finally disposing of it; and I want to say to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Utah that I think they have seen enough now to demonstrate the fact that if we have a time limit on the consideration of this bill, without an agreement to vote on it at a specific time, we will not dispose of it.

There is a danger in a parliamentary sense. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that while I am opposed to the railroad bill and expect to vote against it, I do not want to sail under any false colors; but I say on my honor that I have no desire to and will not unnecessarily delay a vote on it—filibuster against its consideration. I am moved by no motive now to displace it excepting as it is necessary to bring about the passage of an act that, in my judgment, is almost vital to the American people.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have not suggested, nor do I believe, that the Senator from Nebraska will obstruct the consideration of the railroad bill. I have no such thought as that at all. I accept his view with regard to the matter. But I can not and will not take the responsibility of displacing the railroad bill, because I think it ought to remain before the Senate until it is concluded. I have believed, and believe now, that it can be concluded in ample time to deal with the sugar situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I realize the importance of a vote on the so-called sugar bill that the Senator from Oregon seeks to bring before the Senate and which would displace the railroad bill. I am going to vote against his motion, and I desire the RECORD to show the reason why.

I do not minimize the importance to the American people of giving some relief, if it is possible to do so adequately and justly, in the sugar situation; but the country could get along without sugar for a very long time. It can not get along without railroads. The country could pay a high price for sugar without affecting the cost of living, except as to that one item; but the railroad question involves the cost of living in every item of human life and human endeavor.

I think that it is the duty of the majority party in this Chamber to present to the country a bill to relieve the railroad situation. The responsibility for legislation is on the other side of the Chamber, at least the responsibility for a real effort for legislation.

I have heard a good deal of criticism in the last day or two of the pending bill. Men differ and look at conditions from a different viewpoint. A proposition to one man from his angle may look bad, whereas it may look good to another man. From my viewpoint, although there are things in the pending bill that I do not agree with, I think on the whole it is a very good bill. But primarily I think this railroad bill will meet a situation that must be met, and met at an early day, or disaster will follow, and that is that the financial conditions of the country shall be taken care of whilst the railroads are returned to their owners.

I hope at a later hour to be able to discuss the terms of the present bill, but I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in doing it now. I expect to support the bill, because I think it is a good bill; I think it meets, in the main, the situation that confronts the country. But if it is not a good bill and does not meet the situation that confronts the country, then I say it is the duty of the United States Senate to pass some bill.

The House of Representatives has sent a bill here. It is pending before this Chamber. More than a year ago the President of the United States gave notice to the Congress that unless they were ready to legislate he intended to return the railroads to their owners, and suggested that the legislation should be passed before March. It was practically impossible to secure legislation by that date, due to the importance of the question pending before the committee. But when the President came home from Europe, still realizing the importance of this question, still realizing the necessity of returning the railroads to their owners, he again notified the Congress that he intended to do so, and he fixed the 1st day of January as the date when he intended to return the railroads, unless Congress legislated in the meantime.

I have heard men say that he would not do it. I do not know whether he will do it or not, but I know he said he would do it, and so far as my observation of the action of the President of the United States is concerned, I have generally found that when he said he was going to do a thing, he did it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not think it is possible to pass this bill and have it become a law by January 1, the date on which the President said he was going to return the railroads?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would think so, if the Republican Congress was functioning. It may be impossible for a Republican management of Congress to pass the legislation, but I know that when the Democratic Party was in control of the two Houses we passed more important bills in a less space of time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, does the Senator include the Overman bill in that category?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say that there have not been delays with some bills, but I repeat my statement. I know that when the Democratic Party was in control of the legislative branch of the Government the tariff bill that is on the statute books to-day was passed through the House of Representatives in two weeks' time without the adoption of a cloture rule, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was a Member of that body at the time. It was because the men who were there were ready to do business and attended to their business.

Mr. BORAH. It takes longer to correct a mistake than it does to make it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If a mistake was made in turning the railroads over to the Government, I have not heard that suggestion coming from the Senator from Idaho before.

Mr. BORAH. I voted against the bill. That is the record.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had overlooked that fact. But if a mistake was made, then it is all the more important that we should remedy the mistake. I want to say in all kindness to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber I do not often criticize, seldom do I indulge in party criticism, but I think you are subject to party criticism right now in this hour, and I am going to deliver it in all good friendliness. I am not attempting to throw rocks, but I am going to tell you just exactly what I think.

You were intrusted with the control of the Government by the people of the United States a year ago last November. Your term of control commenced on the 4th of March, and the President of the United States, a Democratic President, called you into office in May. Outside of passing some supply bills, which were killed by a filibuster in the closing hours of the last Congress, will you tell me what great material measure you have accomplished for the country in the time that has expired from May down to December? I do not know of any.

There never has been a time when constructive legislation was more needed by the people of the country than it has been in the six or seven months that you have been in power. We had just come out of a great war. All the after-war conditions were threatening the country. You admitted that legislation was needed on many scores, because you introduced the bills and you discussed the questions here. But results you have not produced. No legislation has been passed that affects the cost of living. No legislation has been passed that attempts to cut down war taxes and readjust the Treasury balance for peace conditions. No legislation has been materially considered. The great problem before the people of the United States has been peace, the question of consummating a treaty of peace with Germany. Since May a treaty of peace has been pending in the Senate. For months it stayed in the control of the Republican majority in the Committee on Foreign Relations. For months we debated the conclusions of that committee in the Senate, and finally came to a vote, and the proponents of a resolution of ratification could not command a majority vote in the Senate, where they had a majority of political control.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Right there may I ask the Senator, he being a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, if since this very important bill has been before this session of Congress, he recalls that at any single time a majority of the members of that committee have been present in this Chamber looking after the bill? Is it not a fact that there have been just a mere handful of Senators at all times in the Chamber during the consideration of this, one of the most important bills we have before us?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that is pertinent to the question, and I have not counted the number of Senators who have been here. Senators like to listen to some debate, and they do not want to listen to others. That is a question of personal equation that does not affect the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is inquiring with regard to the presence of Senators in the committee room?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the presence of the committee members here in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was inquiring about the committee meetings.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my friends will allow me, that is not so important a question. It is not material to me whether they sit here and listen or not; what they do is the question.

This bill was taken up for consideration in the Committee on Interstate Commerce for hearings last January, nearly a year ago. There were extended hearings by the full committee.

Subsequently when the Congress met a subcommittee was appointed which gave further extended hearings on the subject to everybody, and then wrote a bill which was reported to the full committee. The full committee sat for weeks, and I want to say so far as the full committee is concerned that I have rarely been on a committee where there was a more full attendance continuously than there was upon the consideration of this bill. Many times we had the entire membership of the committee there, and most of the time we had more than three-fourths of the members there. Then the bill was reported to the Senate and stayed on the calendar for weeks, until the treaty of peace was disposed of. So that everybody had ample opportunity to read the bill and consider it.

As I said, since the Republican Party came into power in the two Houses of Congress there is nothing that stands to their credit on the ledger, not one item of great, important legislation. They have utterly failed in bringing the Senate together to ratify the treaty of peace. They have utterly failed to pass legislation that might ameliorate the conditions of living in this country. Great strikes and industrial disturbances have faced the country. The President of the United States has appealed to the Congress for aid. So far as remedial legislation is concerned not one line has been written on the statute books of the country.

Now, to-day in this hour we have a bill before the Senate that affects the entire industrial life of the United States, affects the Treasury of the United States, affects the lives and peace and happiness of millions of people. Do not forget that the entire financial credit of the railroads was destroyed during war times and under war conditions, not merely because of an increase in the cost of supplies but because you have allowed an increase for labor of more than a billion dollars, and that billion dollars amounts to more than the railroads have ever paid out in any one year for interest on bonds and dividends on stocks.

Do you expect to meet that condition by a return of the railroads without an increased freight rate and an increased passenger rate? Are you going on increasing the wage scale, reflecting it back into the cost of transportation, without some due consideration by the Government in the interest of the people of the country? There is no way to do it now. The bill proposes a way. Have you forgotten the fact that one-fourth of all the securities in the great trust companies, insurance companies, and savings banks of America are railroad securities, and that the mass of the American people are interested in this problem?

Would you dump these railroads back without legislation to meet this situation? Would you force the President to return the railroads on the 1st of January without proper legislation? I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I say that if the Republican Party dares to adjourn this Congress without an honest attempt to pass either this bill or some other bill to meet these conditions that confront the country, the American people will repudiate them in every State in the Union, and they would deserve repudiation by the people.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have the Senator say to the Members of the Senate, on this side at least, whether he advises Senators to vote for the bill as it has been reported from the committee. I will frankly say to the Senator that, as at present advised, I do not feel friendly to the report which has been made. I should like to have the Senator from Alabama say whether he advises the Democratic Members of the Senate to vote for the bill which has been reported from the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that there are some features of the bill of which I do not altogether approve, but it has been rarely the case that I have seen a bill of great importance come before the Senate of which I approved of every feature.

But I do say that the cardinal features of the bill are such that I believe it will protect the financial conditions of the railroads and at the same time not unduly burden the people; that it adopts machinery by which the situation can be worked out justly by the boards appointed by the Government; and so far as I am concerned I shall most cheerfully support the bill. I believe it is the part of wisdom that the Democratic membership in this Chamber should support the Republicans in an effort to pass the bill. But if they do not pass this bill, then they certainly should not want to sidetrack it. It is their duty to aid the majority in the Senate to pass constructive legislation to meet the situation. Then if the other side fail to respond to their duty to the country the people of the United States will know where the responsibility lies and who must take responsibility home with them.

I say the Republican side of the Senate can escape this responsibility no longer. There is no constructive legislation of any kind upon the statute books that is material, with all these months passed by. Senators on the other side of the Chamber are in the majority, but it is our duty to help you in constructive legislation, and, so far as I am concerned, you shall have my help. But a motion now comes from your side of the Chamber to postpone action on a bill that is of the greatest importance to the people of the United States. It is true that the motion is in reference to a question that is vital to the American people, but you have 30 days in which to decide it. If it is passed any time within 30 days, it will be effective, while this legislation ought to be disposed of in 10 days. If Senators did not attempt by the length of their speeches to delay action, we could dispose of it in 10 days. If we had a reasonable cloture rule in this Chamber, without undue limitation upon debate, we could dispose of it in a week. The country is suffering until the legislation shall be disposed of.

I want the RECORD to show how many men on the other side of the Chamber are willing to lay this bill aside. You may say you will lay it aside for an hour to-day, but if you lay this bill aside for the sugar bill what are you going to lay it aside for to-morrow? Are you going to let the Christmas holidays come without action and the 1st of January come and invite the President of the United States to return the railroads to their owners without remedial legislation that is so necessary for their protection?

Mr. President, much as I would like to see an opportunity for consideration of the important measure proposed by the Senator from Oregon, I believe it would be most unwise, it would be bordering almost on a legislative crime, for the majority party in control of the Senate to displace this important railroad bill for any reason. I believe I can say to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, to those who think the bill is adequate and those who believe it is inadequate to meet the situation, that we all realize the importance of some kind of legislation on the subject of the railroad question. We all know that for more than a year the President has been asking for legislation of some kind. I say that we can not escape the responsibility, whether we intend to vote for the bill as it stands or vote for it with remedial amendments, if we displace its consideration as the business before the Senate until it has been disposed of one way or another.

I may differ with my colleagues to some extent as to how the pending bill should be disposed of, but I can not see that there should be any difference between us as to the importance of disposing of it immediately. A vote to take up some other measure can mean but one thing, and that is that the other measure is of more vital importance than the railroad bill. It means that if we consider that line of procedure we may not get through with this legislation until the first day of January arrives.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I see no special reason for not displacing the railroad bill at this time. It is admitted by all that the bill proposed to be considered is of vital concern to the people of the country. Everybody seems to understand that about $800,000,000 might be saved to the consumers of sugar in the United States by the passage of the bill. Almost everyone recognizes the necessity for something of the kind being done.

I do not see any reason why the sugar bill could not be passed in two hours. There is no reason, as it appears to me, why it could not be done. It would not delay the consideration of the railroad bill for any considerable time, and I believe we ought to take up the sugar bill and dispose of it.

As to the suggestion for meeting here at night, I do not think it is a wise one, and I do not think it should obtain. Why are Senators not in the Senate here to-day? It is said that there have been calls for a quorum many times to-day, and that is true. Many times a quorum has been called to-day. Senators are not in the Senate to-day and have not been, and why? Because they are tired, because they are worn out, because they have been here five or six months constantly. That is the condition of Senators to-day.

So far as criticism about a quorum is concerned, it may be just, but on the last quorum call there were present 600 per cent more Democratic Senators than there were Republican Senators, though that is not saying much, because there were present only six Democrats and the Republican making the speech.

That is the condition. If we shall come here and assume to transact business of this importance at night, Senators will not be here and the matter will not have proper consideration. It will not be done; and it ought not to be expected of men under the conditions I have outlined.

Let us pass the sugar bill in two hours, or a day, if necessary. The other matter is of vital importance; it is the most important matter that is before the American people, or will be before the American people for some time to come, after the ratification of the peace treaty. I do not know whether or not the treaty is expected to be again presented for consideration. The disposition of the railroad problem is the most important question thereafter, but it will take some time to adjust it. We ought to give the amount of time which is requisite to be given to it. The sugar question does not need much discussion; it can be disposed of in two hours. I believe the sugar bill ought to displace the pending measure, and that we should consider and pass it at once.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has undertaken to read the Republican side of the Senate a lecture this afternoon with reference to the so-called sugar bill. No one knows better than does the Senator from Alabama that if the pending measure is displaced for the sugar bill, the sugar bill will be passed this afternoon, unless votes upon the Democratic side of the aisle are against it or debate upon that side of the aisle develops into a filibuster and prevents the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object to the Senator putting a prediction in my mouth. I do not know anything of the kind. If the Senator wants to make that prediction, let him make it as his own.

Mr. LENROOT. I think, Mr. President, the RECORD will show that the Senator from Alabama stated that if the pending bill were displaced, a great deal of time would be occupied in the consideration of the sugar bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it will, but I do not know. I can not predict who will occupy the time. I never have done so.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but while the Senator from Alabama is attempting to lecture this side of the aisle, I think he knows the time that will be occupied in debating the sugar bill will be on his side of the aisle and not upon this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is not true, if the pending bill is displaced, the sugar bill will be passed before 6 o'clock to-night; and I suggest to the Senator from Alabama, if the pending bill is displaced, that he use his influence with the Members of his own party to expedite the consideration of the sugar bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has undertaken a general lecture of the Republican side with reference to the legislation that has failed to pass. The Senator from Alabama seems to have forgotten that since the Republicans came into a majority in Congress the telegraph and telephones, which were taken under a Democratic administration, have been returned to their owners; he seems to have forgotten that the food-control act has been largely extended in accordance with the request of the President and that severe penalties have been provided for its violation; and I might go on and name other legislation which has been enacted since the majority passed to this side.

It is true, as the Senator from Alabama has said, that the consideration of the peace treaty during the long time that it was before the Senate did prevent the consideration of other important public measures. The Senator from Alabama, however, did not say what the fact is, that the responsibility for the lengthy consideration of that treaty and the fact that it is not ratified to-day belongs not to the Republican side of the Senate but to the Democratic side of the Senate. While I know that that subject, Mr. President, is one of which we are all tired, I think this is an opportune time to place upon the record just what the status of that matter is and where the responsibility lies.

A great propaganda is now going on over the country backed by certain forces attempting to lay the blame for the present status of the peace treaty upon the Republican side. Nearly every Senator on the other side of the aisle knows that the blame does not lie here, but lies with the Democratic side and with the President of the United States. The Senator from Alabama knows, I am sure——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He does not know that. If the Senator from Wisconsin wants to make that prediction I am perfectly willing for him to do so, and to make it as his own; but I can not allow the Senator to continue to say that I know what he says is so—and I do not want to interrupt his speech—when I do not know it, and I repudiate the statement that the Senator is attempting to make in my name.

Mr. LENROOT. I, perhaps, should change that, but I have known the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for many years, and I esteem him so highly, and he is so very intelligent, that I rather took it for granted that he knew these facts. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The doorkeepers will eject from the galleries persons who are violating the rules of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to assure the Senator from Wisconsin, with whom I have been associated for many years, that my intelligence runs along a different line from his on that subject.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, mine does not run in a groove made for me by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I think it is proper at this time, in view of what has been said, to place upon the record a little of the history of the closing days of the last session with respect to this matter. When this side of the aisle is criticized, and the responsibility is being attempted to be placed upon this side for the present status of the treaty, I want to make the statement that this side of the aisle made plain the basis upon which it was willing to ratify the treaty; and repeatedly, until the vote was taken, we attempted to get Senators on the other side of the aisle to make a proposition upon which they were willing to ratify the treaty. That proposal was repeatedly made to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr.

HITCHCOCK]. We adjourned on Wednesday night, November 19, and on the preceding Tuesday morning the Senator from Nebraska was asked to make such a proposition to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but he informed the Senator from Massachusetts that afternoon that he could not do so, presumably because he had not an opportunity to consult the President of the United States; presumably because the Senators upon the other side of the aisle were not willing to act upon their own responsibility, but intended to follow whatever suggestions the President might make. Until the last vote was taken the Senator from Nebraska knew that if his side had any proposition to make for the settlement of the matter then pending it would be welcomed and considered by this side of the aisle. He refused to make any, and he has not made any up to this date. Until, of course, the other side of the aisle, which had sufficient votes to defeat the ratification of the treaty, make some proposition there is no way by which the matter can be revived and the treaty ratified with proper reservations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate on this subject, but I want to repeat not as an argument, not as a lecture, but as a fact, that the Republican Party in this session of the Senate has not passed any important remedial legislation. The bill which took over the telegraph lines and placed them under the control of the Government itself provided that they should be returned as soon as the war was over. There was no contest about their return—if there had been, the bill would probably still be pending—and there really was no legislation necessary. The other bill to which the Senator has referred was in like category.

It is true that a large portion of the time was taken up in discussion of the treaty of peace, but not by any means all of it, for the treaty of peace came before the Senate and went to the committee in May. I am not sure about the date, but my recollection is that it was reported back and not taken up for consideration by the Senate until July. If I am wrong about that, I hope some Senator will correct me. There was certainly from May to July when there was nothing that stood in the way of remedial legislation being enacted.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the treaty of peace was not presented here until the 10th day of July.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then it was in the committee more than two months.

Mr. LODGE. The committee took it up and acted upon it after it had been presented by the President, on the 10th day of July, and printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At what time was it reported back to the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. It was reported back to the Senate on the 4th day of September.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the point that I have in mind, and I am glad the Senator corrected me. From the time Congress met, in May, until the 4th day of September of this year the treaty of peace was not before the Senate, and so the Senate had full and unlimited opportunity to pass remedial legislation concerning other matters. The treaty of peace did not interfere with that at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator forget all the appropriation bills?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The appropriation bills did not take very much time on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will find that some of them did take considerable time, and furthermore that their initiation was delayed owing to the failure to summon the Congress at an earlier date.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They did not have to get through Congress until the 1st of July; and, as I chanced to be on the Appropriations Committee, I happen to know that the reenactment of the bills that failed on account of a filibuster—and that probably includes all of them; it does include all of them——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, the sundry civil bill was not in the Senate in time to be passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It failed on account of the filibuster being conducted on another measure.

Mr. LODGE. No; it did not fail on account of the filibuster; it failed because the House did not send it here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have seen sundry civil bills reported and acted upon in the Senate within two days after they came here, and a day or so before final adjournment; and we could have reported the sundry civil bill at the last session and it could have been passed, as sundry civil bills and other bills have been passed heretofore, within the time that was left.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It could not be passed until it reached the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was in the Senate; but the committee did not report it.

Mr. LODGE. It was not in the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was not sent over from the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The sundry civil bill was in the Senate, if Senators will allow me to say so.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator thinks I am mistaken, but I happen to know that the bill did come over here before final adjournment.

Mr. LODGE. It may have come here, but it was not laid before the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We could not lay it before the Senate because the appropriation bill which was before the Senate was the general deficiency bill, and it was being filibustered to death.

Mr. LODGE. What happened to the Army bill and to the Navy bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They could not come up because the general deficiency bill was being filibustered to death, and we could not bring them up.

Mr. LODGE. When was the general deficiency bill brought in by the committee? It was brought in within 48 hours of final adjournment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The general deficiency bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. I am not mistaken about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I happened to be in charge of that bill myself, and I sat here all one night trying to get it through.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will look at the RECORD as to when it was brought into the Senate, he will find that it was brought in within 48 hours of final adjournment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is mistaken about the time when it was brought before the Senate. On account of illness, the chairman of the committee asked me to take charge of the bill, so that I was in charge of it myself, and I happen to know how long I sat here trying to get it through.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator was in nominal charge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was in nominal charge; I stand corrected.

Mr. President, I wish to say in regard to the peace treaty that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is trying to put the blame of the failure of the treaty of peace on this side of the Chamber. He can not do that; he never will be able to do that; the country is never going to recognize that argument. If you want to get rid of the responsibility for failing to ratify the treaty of peace, it is, parliamentarily speaking, lying on the Vice President's table; the majority can take it up and consider it, and you have the majority. If you want to pass it, take it up and keep on trying to pass it until you get a two-thirds vote. As I have said, you can not get away from the responsibility for the failure of the treaty, as is evidenced by the concrete fact that you kept the treaty in the committee for months and you kept it before the Senate for months; but on the final passage of the resolution of ratification which you proposed you were unable at any time to command the votes of a majority of the Senate. That was the case.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make one slight correction?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty is not before us. It can not be taken up. The Senate has overruled, no less than three times, the proposition that the Senator has put forth; and the Senator ought to know that it contravenes every precedent, every principle of parliamentary law, and the rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, that is a difference of point of view between myself and the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate has three times decided the other way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will listen to me a moment, I know the Senator stated that on the floor the last time his resolution with reservations was voted on. He stated that if it was rejected the treaty would be defeated, and the Senate had conformed to that order of business, notwithstanding the Vice President had ruled the other way and had been overruled by the Senate. But after the happening of that event I proposed a resolution of unrestricted ratification. There was no point of order made against it. No objection was made to it. It was voted on, and the Senator from Massachusetts himself moved to reconsider my motion and lay it on the table.

Well, now, what was disposed of? My motion was disposed of, but not the treaty. The treaty is now just exactly where it was when the Senator moved to lay my motion on the table. That is the parliamentary situation.

I know perfectly well that as long as a majority of the Senate, a majority on that side, intend to say that the treaty of peace is dead, it is dead temporarily, because nobody can do anything with it. As long as that side of the Chamber continues to say that the treaty is dead on the table of the President of the Senate, it is dead, because the majority will not take it up; but if there was a majority that was supporting myself or the Senator from Massachusetts, and we desired to resurrect the life of the treaty, we could very quickly do it with that majority—I mean as soon as debate ran out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it would be none the less out of order; but, if the Senator will allow me, he knows perfectly well, as well as I do, that the President can withdraw the treaty under the rules of the Senate without the permission of the Senate and resubmit it the same day, and then it is open.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I also know just as well as the Senator does, and he knows, that if the treaty is dead the Senate can send it back to the President and tell him it is dead; but the Senator can not get a majority to reach that conclusion, in my judgment. I think that would be the proper thing to do, from the Senator's standpoint. If the treaty is rejected by the Senate, it is up to the majority of the Senate to notify the President of the United States of the fact, which has not been done, and I think it has not been done because I think the Senator from Massachusetts doubts his ability to command a majority in this body to give that notification to the President.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. Occasionally the President has been notified of adverse action by the Senate on a treaty; sometimes he has not been; but in the last case, the case of the Chamberlain-Bayard treaty, that matter was brought up and it was decided by the Senate that no such order was necessary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, while we are on that subject—we have wandered far afield from what I was talking about—I want to say this:

I recognize the fact that the President could withdraw this treaty and send it back if he wanted to; but why should he? He sent it to the Senate. The Senate has it. It was on the desk of the Presiding Officer when we came out of executive session. It is there now, and a majority can go into executive session and move a vote of ratification, which, according to the original rulings of the Presiding Officer of this body, would be in order. The Senate adopted another rule. If the Presiding Officer followed the rule of the Senate, and not his own construction of parliamentary law, that majority could overrule him again, as they overruled him in the beginning, when I think he was right, and then the Senate could take up the treaty and act on it; and the only reason why it does not act on it is because it can not command a majority vote to act on it, or the majority does not want to act on it.

It seems to me it would be perfectly idle for the President of the United States to withdraw the treaty and send it back here when the Senate itself has indicated that it does not propose to act on the treaty; and if it is dead, it is not dead by my vote. I voted for its unconditional ratification. It is no more dead by my vote that did not command a majority vote than it is dead by the votes of the men who voted for the Lodge resolution that did not command a majority vote. I say it is the duty of the majority side of the Senate, where the responsibility lies, to try to work out some understanding between themselves and this side of the Chamber and the President of the United States by which a treaty of peace can be confirmed and a peace status established in the United States. You have not done it. I did not rise here to criticize you for not doing it, but it is a fact. It is a condition, not a theory. What I do say is that now you come to the second important piece of legislative work that has come before the Senate at this session, the handling of this great railroad bill, and a motion comes from your side of the Chamber to displace it. Now, if you are not going to attend to the business of the country, I say the country should understand it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there may not be very many Senators in the Chamber, but there are some who get a vast amount of consolation out of this discussion of the dead treaty; and if you can not find anyone at all who will assume the responsibility for its death, I think I can. I trust sincerely that it is dead and that it will stay dead. It is the best thing that the Senate has done since it has been in session or for many years, and if it does nothing else except to kill the treaty it will be entitled to the gratitude of the American people for all time to come.

Mr. President, the treaty has passed from the consideration of the Senate to the consideration of the people at large. The politicians who gather in Washington may debate behind closed doors as to whether or not they will make it an issue, but they will have no more effect upon whether or not it shall be an issue than they will have upon what time the sun shall rise tomorrow morning. The American people have a way of assuming jurisdiction and of retaining jurisdiction until they render final judgment, and this question has gone to the jurisdiction of the American people and it will be definitely and finally settled by them in the election of 1920. It does not make any difference how we vote here in the meantime or what proceedings we may have; this question is now in the minds of the masses of the American people and you can not eliminate it, and neither the timid members of my party nor the same kind of members of your party will have the slightest effect in the way of keeping it from the determination of the American people. It is, as has been said, to be an American question, and when you get an American question before the American people the American people will retain it and decide it for themselves. When they enter the election booth they will consider alone the independence of our country and the welfare of our people; they will not be feeling around to see how or where the majority opinion rests.

If there is anything that is eating out the heart of the two old parties in this country to-day it is the lack of moral courage to take hold of these questions and to declare themselves upon them. The political guides are faltering and trimming and seeking to step from under, but the people at large will decide the question according to national interests and national welfare. They will assume a responsibility from which the time-serving politician seeks to escape.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word in reply to the Senator from Alabama.

In spite of anything the Senator from Alabama may say, the record stands that a majority of the Senate of the United States adopted certain reservations to this treaty. It was then rejected by the votes of the alleged friends of the treaty or it would have been ratified. Now, until these alleged friends present some proposition for consideration by the friends of the treaty upon this side of the aisle, of course nothing can be done. So the responsibility lies with the friends of the treaty, who killed it.

Now, just a word with reference to what the Senator from Alabama said concerning the time wasted by the Senate of the United States in May and June of this year.

The Senator from Alabama seems to have forgotten that during those two or three months the Senate of the United States was occupied in the consideration of the appropriation bills which failed at the last session; and this Republican Congress in passing the appropriation bills reduced them by $939,692,541.07 over the same bills passed by the last Democratic Congress. That is fairly good work, I think, Mr. President—the Republican Congress saving money to the people of the United States at the rate of about $400,000,000 a month. Possibly the Senator from Alabama may sneer at a little item of nearly a billion dollars, but the taxpayers think something of a matter of that importance.

Now, just a word with reference to this motion.

I do not believe the railroads of this country should be returned until next spring. I do not believe they should be returned to their owners at the highest period of cost of operation and the lowest period of revenue. The Senator from Alabama says that the President says that they will be returned on the 1st of January. Well, Mr. President, possibly autocracy has gotten so far in this country that when Cæsar speaks he can no longer change his mind; but I can not assume that the President of the United States, when the House has passed a bill returning the roads to their owners and when the Senate is engaged in the consideration of such a bill, is going to return them on the 1st of January. If he does, and the railroads are forced into bankruptcy, the responsibility will not lie with the Republican Congress, but will lie with the President of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, now that the buck has been passed and repassed I suggest a vote upon the motion.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the time I made the motion to consider what is known as the sugar bill I was conscious of the importance of the railroad legislation before the Senate. However, I do not believe that by displacing it for the afternoon any considerable time will be lost. It is not necessary for me to undertake to describe the sugar situation or the importance of early railroad legislation; but, Mr. President, a large part of this day has been destroyed, the last hour and a half by political debate. If we had talked less politics and more sugar,

I think we would have had this bill passed by this hour; and if we would take up the consideration of the sugar bill at this hour I have every confidence that we could pass it by 6 o'clock. I wish Senators would bear that in mind. I would gladly defer action until this evening if I thought it were possible to have a quorum present, but I do not think so, and in that view I sincerely hope that the majority will be found supporting the motion which has been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No business has intervened since there was a quorum call, and the Chair will not entertain a call for a quorum when debate only has intervened. It has been the universal ruling of every Presiding Officer who ever occupied this chair, and on appeals from the rulings of the Presiding Officer the ruling has been sustained that debate is not the discharge of business. The Chair takes cognizance of the fact that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call and refuses to call for a quorum.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is the situation, then, that there has been no business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have asked for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to vote intelligently on this matter, and I have not a very clear idea of the situation. I want to say at the outset that I am in favor, wherever it is possible, of getting rid of the laws that invoke the interference of the Government in the affairs of the American people, and I want to vote to that end whenever I get a chance. I do not understand this situation, and I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon, or some of those who have the information, some questions.

Does this necessity, or seeming necessity, for the interference of the Government, or for the continuation of the Board of Equalization, a part of whose powers I see by the bill are to be restricted, grow out of the fact that there is such a sugar shortage that the law of supply and demand will put the price of sugar beyond the reach of the ordinary individual, or does it arise from the fact that there may be enough sugar to go around, but that somebody is cornering the market? I would like to understand the situation before I vote.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from South Carolina, who is usually in touch with public matters, has not given the sugar situation some consideration. The bill simply authorizes the Sugar Equalization Board, acting in its legislative capacity, to acquire raw sugars of the crop of 1921, if they can be obtained at a fair and reasonable price. The purpose of that is to enable the Government, acting under that agency, to go out and acquire the raw sugar crop in Cuba and elsewhere which is necessary to supply the American public with a normal quantity of sugar. Briefly, that is the purpose of the measure and the object which I think it will accomplish.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Does the Senator say it is to enable the board to purchase the foreign and domestic crop?

Mr. MCNARY. Yes.

Mr. GAY. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. GAY. I merely would like to say that the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, Mr. Zabriskie, informed the Government that it is too late to have any kind of control that could be enforced. It is the opinion of the president of the equalization board, and it is the opinion of a great many people who are well posted, that if the policy of noninterference in business had been adopted by the Government some time ago there would not be the scarcity of sugar existing at this time, and there is no reason now why an adequate supply of sugar can not be obtained from Cuba in the usual manner that was followed prior to the war.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only matter that is concerning me now is that this is a time of peace, and we are about to establish a precedent here of the Government entering in to relieve a condition which it seems to me those who engage in merchandise in this country are perfectly competent to relieve. If somebody is buying this crop or taking advantage of the scarcity of sugar and cornering it, why was the Sherman antitrust law written upon the statute books? Why have we gone and solemnly committed ourselves to the farce of trying to enact legislation which will deter the evil-minded from doing things, and then, while it is on the statute books, invoking the Government to go into business in order to prevent the people themselves from coming in and running the business?

If I understand the condition, there is a scarcity of sugar, and for fear that somebody somewhere will corner the supply and put the price beyond what is thought reasonable, the Government must step in and assume the function of purchaser and of vendor to the people in order to keep the price within what they think are reasonable bounds.

If it was during the war and conditions were abnormal by virtue of that fact, it would be a different proposition; but for us to continue the Government in the practice of buying is with me a question of principle. I would infinitely rather see a commodity go to any kind of a price than for us to commit ourselves to the doctrine of socialism. That is what is the matter with us now. We are not only assuming to become a merchant but we are absolutely becoming the guardians of labor and of capital, telling capital how much it shall make upon an investment and labor how much it shall get when the capital is put into operation. I do not know what other steps the Government can take that will differentiate it from being the most pernicious form of paternalism and of socialism, interfering in every direction.

Such evils will necessarily come, but it is for the people themselves to settle this question. I would rather have the buyers and sellers of sugar settle this question amongst themselves, and if they find some one who is really trying to corner the market, hale him before the courts and let the world know, than for us to camouflage the situation by the Government buying and selling. Let us go back to a prewar status, and let people find out who it is that wants to sell sugar at 25 and 30 cents a pound.

I am informed that sugar is being sold in New York now at around 9½ and 10 cents a pound. Just the other day down in my South Carolina home I bought 160 pounds and gave 20 cents a pound for it, and the party who sold it to me asked me to put it in a sack and try to smuggle it out, for he did not know what would happen to him if it was found out that he sold me so much sugar. There was some kind of a rule or regulation about selling an individual that much sugar. I do not know but what I am liable to indictment now for getting 160 pounds of sugar, even though I paid 20 cents a pound for it.

Mr. President, in all seriousness, a man has to pinch himself to know whether he is in America or not, whether he is living under the Government that he thought he was living under or whether we are in distressed and disrupted Europe. Can we not trust the American people, who buy and sell in the markets? If there are scoundrels who take advantage of the situation we have a law to meet the case, and we ought to invoke it. I am opposed to any further Government interference, if there is any possibility of getting away from it, and it looks to me as if some one could ferret out and account for the present abnormal condition.

I do not know whether the alleged facts are true, but it was stated, I think, by the Senator from Idaho on the floor here the other day that vast quantities of sugar are being exported from this country. It was also alleged by another, as I stated a moment ago, that in one region they are selling sugar at about 10 cents a pound and in another region sugar at wholesale is bringing 18 and is being retailed at 20, 22, and 23 cents a pound, all right here in the same country. Is there no one who can understand and meet this condition without remedying it by the Government stepping in and becoming the shopkeeper for America, letting these persons understand that under the law against trusts and combinations they will be prosecuted? Let the people settle the question as to what they shall give and let the markets assume their normal course.

I predict that if we extend the life of this Sugar Equalization Board for one year more we shall have to extend its life another year, and, as has been intimated here by others, why not appoint an equalization board for beef and for the meats of this country? They are abnormally high. Shoes that cost $6 before the war are now $25 a pair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he does not believe that all the high price of sugar about which he complains is the result of the so-called zone system?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think it is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. You are in what is known as the southern zone, or the New Orleans zone?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The 20-cents-a-pound zone.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the 20-cents-a-pound zone, and you are not permitted to buy any sugar in New York at 10 cents a pound.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And carry it to my home.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And carry it to your zone.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Therefore, I presume the high price of Louisiana sugar is the result of the zone system, requiring others to buy the Louisiana sugar when Louisiana has not any sugar to sell.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am beginning to get some light on this question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have an amendment which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] has been good enough to say that he will accept, which provides for this very matter, to be added to the bill, as follows:

Provided, That zones in which certain kinds of sugar only may be sold shall not be established by the said equalization board and that prices of foreign, Louisiana, and beet sugar, and the other various grades of sugar, shall be equal and uniform for each grade throughout the United States and to all the citizens thereof, and that sugar may be bought in any part of the United States for distribution and use in any other portion of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Can you not amend that by repealing the zones?

Mr. McKELLAR. This repeals the zone system, because there is nothing in the law that provides for it. This prohibits the zone system, and I am sure will have the effect desired by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Oregon has already announced his willingness to accept it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee if that should pass, what would be the necessity of extending the life of the board to look after the matter?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand it, it is that our principal source of supply is Cuba, and the Cuban planters have offered to sell to the equalization board in bulk at a price, I believe, of 10½ cents a pound, so that it will guarantee, if the equalization board is directed to buy and does buy the crop of Cuban sugar, as it is believed it can buy it, the American people will be certain that during the ensuing year they will not have to pay more than 12 cents a pound at the outside for sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to correct an error into which the Senator from Tennessee inadvertently has entered?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. The people of Cuba have not agreed to any such price as that. Some time ago they did offer to sell their sugar in bulk, but they specifically withdrew their proposition to sell.

Mr. McKELLAR. They offered to sell some time ago.

Mr. RANSDELL. Several months ago; but they withdrew that proposition. So we do not know that we could buy it now if we had the money and were authorized to buy it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator from Louisiana think that we ought to try to buy it? Does he not think we ought to save this enormous amount of money to the users of sugar in this country? Does not the Senator think we ought to undertake in some way to prevent this enormous loss to the American people?

Mr. RANSDELL. So far as I am concerned, I would be entirely willing to pass a law authorizing our equalization board to attempt to purchase from Cuba, but this proposed bill says "purchase from America." The bill proposes to interfere with the business of Louisiana, of the beet-sugar people, the Hawaiian people, and the Porto Rican people. If they will also interfere with the selling of butter and eggs in your State, and the selling of meats in other places, and lard and flour and meal and every commodity on earth, so that all the laws of supply and demand in America are interfered with, and we are not allowed to do business in the orderly way in which we have always done it, then I say I will make no objection to sugar; but as long as I have breath in me I will stand here and oppose sugar being singled out for this absolute and complete violation of all law that we knew in this country prior to the Great War, which caused us to do away with law.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may have the permission of the Senator from South Carolina to answer the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that whenever the butter and egg people sell their butter and eggs at one price to a part of the people of the United States, and whenever the beef people sell their beef at one price to a portion of the people of the United States, and in another zone increase that price from 50 to 100 per cent, we had better regulate the butter and egg people and the beef people, too. That is what government is for.

We are paying in the Tennessee district from which I come almost double the price for sugar that people are paying in this District. It is an outrage upon the American people. It is an outrage upon the people of Tennessee that they are required to pay almost double the price for sugar that the people are paying in other States.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will stay here quite as long to protect the interests of Tennessee that are being exploited for the benefit of somebody as the Senator from Louisiana will stand by the people of his State.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to answer the question if I can.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if he does not think the whole trouble might be righted if the authority which created the zones could be annulled? The whole trouble comes from the Sugar Equalization Board creating a series of zones. In one zone, the zone along the North Atlantic coast, it is selling the remnant of last year's Cuban sugar crop at around 9 cents to the wholesaler. It has created another zone where the beet-sugar people are not permitted to sell, as I understand it, at over 10½ cents a pound. Then it has created another zone in which the Louisiana people are permitted to sell, not at a price fixed by the equalization board but at a price which the Attorney General says will not be profiteering, to wit, 17 to 18 cents a pound.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am unwilling for that to be done.

Mr. RANSDELL. I care nothing for it as a Louisianian. I do not ask for that. I will join the Senator from Tennessee this minute in repealing any authority which the equalization board has to fix zones. I want my people in Louisiana to stand absolutely on the laws of supply and demand, and that is all they ask. They want to be let alone. We will be glad to have you let us alone. That is all any American citizen ought to ask. But in God's name do not pass a law here saying that some governmental agency in times of peace like these shall go down to Louisiana and tell those people that they must sell their sugar, shall go to Hawaii and tell those people they must sell their sugar, shall go to Porto Rico and tell those people they must sell their sugar, shall go to the sugar-beet States and tell those people they must sell their sugar.

I say that if you are going to break up the rules and regulations of all the decent respectable business, if you are going to destroy the democratic ideas under which this Government has so long thriven, you should not limit it to sugar. Apply it to everything. Apply it, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said, to shoes and to meat and to everything else. Let us have fair play now. Louisiana, I repeat, asks no favoritism whatsoever—absolutely none.

Destroy the zone-creating authority, and you will get rid of that trouble. If the zone-creating authority were out of office, then you could go into New York and buy sugar and carry it down to Tennessee. Then you could go into the sugar-beet States and buy sugar and carry it to Tennessee; and if Louisiana could not meet the competition of the sugar-beet people and the New York refiners, then she could not sell her sugar. That is all there is to it.

Destroy that war authority. We had lots of authority during the war, and most of it, thank God, has gone out of existence. Here is one, however, functioning yet to some extent and creating all sorts of inequalities. Do not get it into your head that anybody in Louisiana wants you to be compelled to buy in Louisiana. We want you to have authority to buy anywhere on earth you can buy. At the same time we in Louisiana wish to be authorized to sell to anybody who will buy our goods and not be limited to selling to the United States Government.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have just a few more words to say and then I am through. I am glad that I started this discussion, because it has led me to see possibly the cause of the present discriminatory prices.

The arbitrary fixing of zones by this board has given certain individuals, it appears, a monopoly of a certain region. It has shut out competition. I am perfectly willing now, if that is a fair understanding of the question, to have it definitely understood by the legislation that we may pass this afternoon that America is the zone for the sale of sugar—not any particular part for any particular source of supply, but that America is the zone where this equalization board shall function for the purpose, under this emergency, of getting in as much outside sugar as they can.

In conclusion I will merely say that I hope that we will all have enough sugar for Christmas under any circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3284. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent in Virginia on account of illness in his family. I have a pair with that Senator during his absence and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] which I transfer to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut, which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

So Mr. MCNARY's motion was rejected.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to offer the amendment to the McNary bill that I read only a few moments ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GAY. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. GAY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, the question that is now pending is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I have already twice discussed the amendment, but there are many Senators present who were not present during the discussion of either the Senator from Montana or myself. I do not intend to repeat what I have said, but simply to call attention to the character of the amendment.

The Senator from Montana proposes to strike from the bill those provisions which require the presence on the board of directors of railway companies organized or reorganized under this proposed act of two representatives of the employees and two representatives of the Government. The view of the committee is that we have done the best we can to avoid differences of opinion, to promote harmony and good feeling. With that suggestion, so far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to have a vote upon the amendment.

[Mr. MCKELLAR addressed the Senate. After having spoken, with interruptions, for about one hour, he yielded the floor for the day.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will not allow us to have a very short executive session?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. GAY. As a substitute, Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until that hour.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator withhold the motion so that we may have an executive session? I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, December 12, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, ever susceptible to the needs of Thy children, let Thy spirit possess us to guide us through the changing scenes of this day that we may reflect Thy glory in whatsoever we put our hands to.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

In the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, before the Journal is approved I desire to call attention to a collocation of words in the Journal which to me seems wrong. In one place the Journal recites the fact that the Speaker "directed" the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House. The Speaker does not direct the House. The Speaker resolves the House, and I think the Journal ought to make it appear in that way. Of course, it does not amount to very much, but I think we might as well have it right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has called the matter to the attention of the Clerk, and the Chair feels sure that the suggestion will be given the proper consideration. Without objection, the Journal of yesterday, as read, will be approved.

There was no objection.

WILD BIRDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1199) to prohibit the purchase, sale, or possession for the purpose of sale of certain wild birds in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments thereto, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1199, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are the Senate amendments?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois] to prohibit the sale of certain game birds in the District of Columbia. As the bill was introduced and passed the House of Representatives and as it went to the Senate, it included, among others, certain migratory birds. The Department of Agriculture called attention to the fact that migratory birds were covered by the treaty applying to migratory birds, and asked to have them eliminated from the bill. The Senate, therefore, amended the bill by striking out all migratory birds that were embraced in the bill originally so that it would apply only to nonmigratory birds.

Mr. MADDEN. And that is all of the change there is?

Mr. MAPES. That is all of the change.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, and read the Senate amendments.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 3187. An act to dispose of a certain strip of public land in Waterville, Me.; and

S. J. Res. 131. Joint resolution making immediately available the appropriation for the expenses of regulating further the entry of aliens into the United States.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia have leave to sit to-morrow, Friday, December 12, 1919, during the session of the House, for the purpose of conducting hearings on the so-called half-and-half plan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the District Committee be allowed to sit to-morrow during the session of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF COAST GUARD PATROL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 10404) to amend sections 4, 8, and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, to provide for a division of patrol guard in the Bureau of Immigration, and for other purposes, together with the report thereon, be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10404, which has been reported by the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration, together with the report thereon, be recommitted to that committee. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the object in recommitting this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would say that this bill is primarily a naturalization bill, an omnibus bill, which picks up many bills that have been introduced. There was added to it one feature, section 7, which is an immigration matter, which provides for the establishment of a division of patrol guards in that Bureau of Immigration in the Department of Labor, for the purpose of patrolling the coast and land boundaries of the United States. That is an immigration matter.

Mr. MADDEN. How much would that involve? How many people would that provide employment for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not say. We undertake in that paragraph to make an authorization of $250,000. The trouble with the matter is this. We have a partial coast patrol, paid for by the Immigration Service. We also have a coast guard, and the duties of the men in that service include the picking up of aliens who attempt to enter the United States surreptitiously.

Mr. GARNER. Why does the gentleman want to recommit this bill? I understand he wants to get that provision out of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can offer an amendment when he takes the bill up for consideration in the House to strike out that provision, and that will obviate this request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me go a little bit further. The first paragraph repeals the requirement for a certificate of arrival to be filed by the alien at the time he petitions for naturalization.

Mr. GARNER. Why can the gentleman not offer an amendment in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and have it adopted by the committee, and in that way perfect his bill, and pass it as we do other bills. There is no necessity for recommitting this bill. If the gentleman wants to hasten this legislation, he can take it up to-day, amend his bill if he desires, and then pass the bill, and we will in that way have a chance to put you on record with respect to patrolling the border, and that is what I am going to do. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning I asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from the oil producers engaged in business in Mexico. I see that that has been printed in the RECORD this morning in the Senate proceedings, so I shall not further take that matter up. I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from the Elks Lodge of Sharon, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a memorial from the Elks Lodge of Sharon, Pa. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would suggest to the gentleman that similar resolutions have been sent to nearly all Members. It is desirable to keep the size of the RECORD down, and therefore I object.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a list of the personnel of the Navy during the war, a matter in which we are all interested. It is an official list. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF CONGRESS FOR DECEMBER, 1919.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1919.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1919, on the day of adjournment of the present session for the holiday recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman understand that to include the payment of clerks to Members?

Mr. GOOD. They are on the salary roll, and it includes all officers and employees of the House, including the Capitol police, and it is the customary resolution that has always been passed at this season of the year.

Mr. CALDWELL. I wanted to be sure, because they are now on the roll.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman speaks of adjournment for the holiday recess. May I ask the gentleman upon what day the steering committee has decided upon such adjournment?

Mr. GOOD. I am not authorized——

Mr. BLANTON. So that we who did not get a chance to go home during the 10-day recess may yet get a chance to go there?

Mr. GOOD. I am not informed as to the exact time. I have heard some talk of December 20, but as to the exact day——

Mr. BLANTON. That would be Saturday of next week.

Mr. GOOD. As I understand.

Mr. BLANTON. I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming that question while I have the floor. Would the gentleman from Wyoming kindly give us light on that subject? What day may we expect the holiday adjournment?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in due time I expect to offer a resolution for a holiday recess from December 20 until January 5.

Mr. BLANTON. That is sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. There was considerable confusion at the time the gentleman was making the statement. Do I understand this to be the usual resolution which is passed prior to taking a holiday recess for the compensation of employees of the House and Capitol——

Mr. GOOD. And the Senate; it is.

Mr. WALSH. And is in the usual form?

Mr. GOOD. In the usual form, except formerly the resolution provided for the payment of compensation to Members that went to them for clerk hire. Now the clerks have been placed on the roll and therefore there is a slight change in the phraseology, just to conform to the change in the statute.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. BRAND. I wanted to know why the gentleman discriminates in the resolution between the officers and employees of the House and Senate and Members of Congress. Why does not the gentleman include Members of Congress in this resolution?

Mr. GOOD. Well, they never have been; and I have simply followed the custom that has obtained in the Congress for a great many years.

Mr. BRAND. I know it never has been done, and that is the reason why I ask the question. Why should the gentleman exclude Members from the terms of the resolution?

Mr. GOOD. I suppose it was the intention of Congress to take care of those employees who receive comparatively small salaries and who at this season of the year are very anxious to have their pay immediately before Christmas.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Members of Congress are presumed not to need that.

Mr. BRAND. I know; but——

Mr. GOOD. I can not give the gentleman any further reason.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF LIMITATION FOR PURCHASES OF LAND AND CONSTRUCTION IN MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 415, submits a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that the same be agreed to.

The resolution is as follows:

House resolution 415.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8819, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919. After general debate, which shall continue not to exceed one hour, one-half to be controlled by those favoring the bill and one-half by those opposing, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Thereupon the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on all amendments and on the bill to its passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes it in order for the House to consider the bill to allow the War Department to conclude contracts, finish payments made with respect to the purchase of aviation, infantry, and artillery fields made subsequent to the signing of the armistice. These contracts were suspended by a provision in the Army appropriation bill some months ago, and it is thought desirable by the Committee on Military Affairs that the matter be brought before the House and considered as provided in the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if the rule confines general debate to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not in so many words, but it is not intended, I understand, that any other subject is to be discussed except the merits of the matter brought before the House.

Mr. WALSH. How much does this appropriation bill carry?

Mr. ANTHONY. Nine millions and some hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WALSH. Is one hour's debate on a nine-million dollar appropriation bill rather liberal?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is intended, I understand, to allow liberal debate under the five-minute rule as these separate items are read. It is thought it would be more useful to the House to discuss the merits of the individual projects when they are reached than to spend time in discussion in general debate.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman understands there will be no effort to shut off legitimate discussion under the five-minute rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. BLANTON. There was an application, as I understand, for a rule to the gentleman's committee some time ago on the resolution to show deserved recognition for the splendid services rendered by Gen. Crowder during the war. May I ask the gentleman what has become of that resolution before his committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is still pending.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman what is holding back that very deserved recognition to which Gen. Crowder is entitled?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The matter is being held back, and it is not germane to the matter now under consideration to tell why or by whom.

Mr. BLANTON. Something is holding it back.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. Something is holding it back. It is not now under consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is aware that it is very helpful to the Members to have a little advance knowledge of legislation that is to come up. Lack of that information causes a great deal of inconvenience to some of us. Can the gentleman from Kansas or the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] indicate as to what legislation is to come up in the House in the near future? I assume this bill will be passed to-day, and I would be glad to have some intimation as to what is to come up to-morrow and on Saturday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman raises an interesting question. I have not taken that matter up with the Speaker or majority leader. I do think we should provide for a statement from the Chair or from the majority leader as to what the business of the House shall be within the next two or three days. I do not think the practice of bringing a rule in for the immediate consideration of a bill without notice to the House is desirable. This is a matter that I have thought of taking up with the Committee on Rules and probably submit it to the House, together with some other amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows it is not always possible to inform the House very far in advance as to what business is to be taken up. A week ago a tentative arrangement was made for a report from the committee on war expenditure investigation to-day. Owing to the illness of one of the members of that committee it was impossible to have that order of business to-day. It became necessary to present this in lieu of that order of business. That was unavoidable. To-morrow is Private Calendar day. I imagine that we will spend the day on the Private Calendar; and Saturday, if the Member who has been indisposed is better and is prepared, the matter of the report from the committee on war expenditure investigation will be brought up. Monday we will take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON. But, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kansas will yield further, in the event the gentleman referred to is still ill on Saturday, then we may expect on Saturday a rule will be brought in without notice to the House to bring up some other legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know just how it will be arranged so far in advance. I do not think the House ever has arranged to provide far in advance in regard to legislation to take the place of measures that by reason of some unexpected contingency can not be taken up. I think the House should be informed as far in advance as possible as to the business that is to come up, but it is not always possible to determine, because of many considerations. The committees do not always know just when they are going to be ready to present their matters.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment further?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Military Affairs was promised long ago that when they were ready to present this bill an opportunity would be granted them as soon as possible, as it is an important piece of legislation. But it is not always possible for a committee to determine in advance when they can report, and in this particular case there was a question as to which of two matters should be considered to-day, and that question was determined on the reasons I have just stated.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, what I have said, and what I still say, is that it is desirable that the House shall be notified as far in advance as possible what subject will be considered, if some rule or practice to that effect can be agreed upon.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know that no one in the House expects anything more than that.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether it would be feasible to print in the Calendar such matters as we know are coming up and state the time. I do not know whether it could be done, and have it placed in the Calendar from day to day, by handing it to the tally clerk, who arranges the Calendar, so that when we pick up the Calendar we will know what is to come up in accordance with the arrangement of the steering committee in their recommendations. I realize as much as anyone in the House the inconvenience that we all suffer in not knowing what is coming up except on special days.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] desires to ask me a question, and I will yield to him first.

Mr. LITTLE. I find in the bill $1,100,000 to buy land at Camp Bragg, N. C.; $811,000 to buy land at Camp Knox, Ky.; and $515,000 to buy land at Camp Benning, Ga. That is $3,000,000 of this money that is to go to buy real estate for more camps. Has the Committee on Rules investigated that sufficiently so that it believes it to be an urgent necessity, or does it expect to depend on the Committee on Military Affairs for that information?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the Committee on Military Affairs has stricken out some of the figures to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. LITTLE. They are back in again as amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been materially reduced in some instances. Most of the figures the gentleman refers to are in the bill, and at the proper time we will be glad to show the reason for them.

Mr. LITTLE. But covering that point the Committee on Rules has no information?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In a general way. The Committee on Rules has sufficient information to justify it in bringing it to the House in considering the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one minute?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I voted to bring this rule out on the floor of the House. While as an individual I do not believe that I am in sympathy with a single one of the items carried in the bill, yet after the statement made by the acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in which he showed what a critical condition several of these projects are in and how the Government would lose more money in some cases by not buying them than it would by purchasing them on account of the rent we were paying at the present time, I considered that it was of enough importance to warrant the bringing of this matter on the floor of the House and allowing all the Members to get full information and act upon it as they saw fit.

I am not in favor of the proposition, but it is of importance that this House should consider it at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], speaking generally, and not with respect to the individual matter to which this resolution relates, that as a new Member of the House, not connected with any important committee, I have found a good deal of embarrassment in the fact that notice is not given in advance of the business to be considered by the House. Ordinarily that is the case. The most important business the House considers is taken up under special rules, such as that now proposed, or on the call of committees, without notice previously given—really without notice of any kind. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Kansas express the purpose to make an attempt to devise a rule to correct that condition. My investigation leads me to think—and I have made some investigation of the subject—that this is the one great legislative body where no effective effort is made to notify the membership beforehand of the business that is to be dealt with at a particular session.

I find that in the English House of Commons an arrangement is made for some notice; that in the French Assembly notice is given at the conclusion of a day's session of the business that will be taken up at the next session, and that this is also true of the German Reichstag. It seems to me that it is exceedingly desirable, if the Members of the House are to try to take part in its business—and the duty of doing this was impressed upon us all in a very strong and interesting speech made some time ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]—that some attempt ought to be made to afford them the opportunity to know at least some hours in advance what business will be considered. I congratulate my friend from Kansas on his purpose to do that. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is very desirable. I have very little more time, Mr. Speaker, and——

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I wanted to know whether the bill that your rule makes in order to-day covers all cases where the Government has contracted for purchase of property for war purposes and has not sufficient money to pay the balance of the purchase money?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not advised as to that; but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is advised.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does the bill include only a few cases or all? I have several instances in my district where the purchase money has not passed, although the Government has held title for a year and a half; rents not paid, though promised by the War Department, and the owners are suffering financially by reason thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that the bill does not cover all cases; only those that we have been able to give some investigation to and which are most urgent.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman yields to me, he yields to me with the right to yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas; Yes; with the right to yield.

Mr. GARRETT. Before the gentleman yields the floor and before that time begins to run, I want to say it has been suggested to me that it might be desirable to get unanimous consent to amend the rule so that the time will be in the control of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. As the rule reads, it says the time shall be "in control of those in favor of and those against." If that meets the approval of the gentleman, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall make that request before moving the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That will be the case, anyhow.

Mr. GARRETT. The rule says, "those in favor and those against."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whoever is recognized will get a half hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall make that request before moving the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is to make in order a bill which will give the House an opportunity to correct a mistake that was made some months ago, when the majority, without proper investigation, forced legislation through here which has tied up the execution of contracts that had been entered into in good faith and which has put a very large number of property owners to very great inconvenience. I think it is very desirable that the House should have that opportunity of correcting that mistake and of perfecting the legislation that is essential along the lines involved in the bill.

Now, I reserve the remainder of my time. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is very much like a motion for a new trial where the parties come into court and ask that the relief asked for should now be granted. The items that are given in the bill are items for the purchase of land which in almost every case the Government has contracted to buy.

Now, the question involved here is a very much broader one than simply the fact that the Government could save money by passing this measure to-day, and I am in favor of considering it now, because I am in favor of the Government carrying out its contracts which have been entered into with its citizens in all good faith.

We were under specific obligations in these cases to buy land—under obligations both moral and legal. The Government took over the property. Farmers in many cases—I may say in most cases—were the owners of the property, and it caused them to leave their farms, crops, and everything, and they are left now, right to-day, after a long lapse of time, without relief, and no means of taking a step forward as to what they will do in the acquisition of further property, because they do not know what the Government is going to do. We have found cases where the Government has actually received the deed to the property. I know a case, an item in this bill with which I am familiar, where the Government now holds the deed and has served all the proper legal notices of the exercise of its option and having accepted the deed and with no money to pay for the property is not even paying rent for the land. There is not just one case, but there are a number of cases just like it.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that the act of July 11, 1919, prevented the Government from purchasing land where they had made contracts, where they had entered upon it and used it?

Mr. FISHER. It did. It actually prohibited them where they had exercised the right of option to purchase from even paying rent any longer. Thousands of dollars to-day are due property owners for rent, and there is no way to bring about a settlement. The land is held and is being used by the Government, and the property owners have no hope unless this bill is passed or something done to make the Government carry out its obligations.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the case at Camp Holabird, Md., where the Government agreed to accept the property, occupied it for a long time, and refuses to carry out the contract.

Mr. LAYTON. What I can not understand is this, can Congress, by virtue of its authority, break a contract which Congress has authorized the Government to make?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Congress can do it by not appropriating the money to carry out the contract.

Mr. FISHER. There are cases to-day where the Government is in court, having filed petitions for condemnation. To-day if the parties go into court and ask that the case be dismissed it would be dismissed because the Government has no money with which to pay an award. The Government would lose its rights, and if it files other condemnation suits the value would be fixed on the property as of the day it filed the new suit.

Throughout the country hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent upon this property. The Government could take the improvements off, such as buildings, but they have spent millions of dollars improving the property in many ways, and this increased value would be absolutely lost to the Government unless this bill is passed enabling the Government to profit by the increased value by simply carrying out its obligations. In some cases the Government now may have lost its rights. The quicker this measure becomes a law the quicker the relief will be given to property owners, and the Government will be saved millions of dollars in damages.

I want to show you the way the Government has treated the farmer, and it is always said that in legislative bodies farmers have a preferential right. Under a mineral claims law we have provided for an adjustment board, and millions of dollars are being paid those who started operations on mines to produce minerals for the prosecution of the war. We have paid large sums to the shipbuilders for wooden ships that we have now no use on earth for, and also for houses that were used to house the employees. Large sums are given them for damages. We are paying out hundreds of millions on informal contracts, contracts that were not even signed. The Congress passed a bill which gave the War Department that right. We are even preparing to pay out many millions of dollars—I do not know exactly how much—to people who have planted castor beans.

I say that when we go that far and when farmers and property owners have been driven from their homes and farms and no assurance given as to when they would be paid for their property, it looks to me like it is a very much more serious proposition and a broader issue than the mere question of whether or not we save money now by passing this measure—it is a question whether or not we make good our obligations.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. In these cases, were they started by contract or condemnation proceedings?

Mr. FISHER. In practically every instance there is either a contract or a petition for condemnation.

It is also a question of business judgment, and every member of the committee, after a very careful study, states that it will save money, millions of dollars, if the Government is given authority to complete these transactions.

Mr. ROSE. As a legal proposition, is not a party filing condemnation proceedings forced under the law to make the purchase of the property?

Mr. FISHER. You can not force the United States Government. The property owners can force the Government only by going to the Court of Claims, and every Member of Congress knows what it means to go to the Court of Claims. I say that it is not the proper treatment to accord the people to whom we promised to pay money.

We took away the land for aviation fields and camp sites and built buildings on them, and that land has been destroyed for the purpose that the farmers used it, and when the question of damages comes up, then in many cases nearly the total value of the land will be eaten up by damages which will have to be paid the property owners. Land that was used for rice fields, the levees have been torn down and the pumping stations taken away, and it is entirely unfitted for its former use.

There are many cases where the damages are the total value of the land.

I have told all those who made inquiries of me as to the probable outcome that the majority leader in this House had assured us when the item was put in the Army appropriation bill last June that this matter would be righted. The leader of the majority, speaking on June 13, specifically stated:

> In my opinion, we will be in session some months, and after this provision becomes a law the War Department will let us know speedily and promptly what the different obligations are, and we will meet them.

So it seems to me this measure should meet with no opposition whatsoever, if we believe in contracts, if we believe in economy, if we believe in carrying on the War Department for any purpose whatsoever; because these items here provide for flying fields; and every single officer who has been before our committee has said these flying fields are absolutely essential to the success of our service. The same applies to the development of the Infantry and to the development of the Artillery.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. May the gentleman have an additional minute? I should like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the officials who entered into these contracts had authority to do so?

Mr. FISHER. They had full authority.

Mr. KNUTSON. There is no question about that?

Mr. FISHER. None on earth.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee has just stated that there was no question about the legal authority of those who made these contracts to make them. I understand the Committee on Military Affairs find that many of these contracts were made without proper authority, for the reason that they were made after the armistice was signed.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Contracts were made for large areas of land that were of questionable necessity after the armistice was signed, and it is for the consummation of these contracts, upon which millions of money were expended both for purchase price and for improvements, that it is necessary that Congress now, in order to protect itself and the Government, conclude the contracts by paying the balance of the purchase price. Miles of areas were purchased in one section, farms here and there over large areas, leaving farms scattered through these areas which were not purchased, and it is for the purpose of paying the purchase price of these scattered portions of land in these large areas in order to complete the Government holdings and enable the Government to use the land at all that it is necessary to spend some of this money.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The contracts were made with questionable authority, and the Congress acted wisely upon the information it had at the time when it refused to make the money further available for the payment for lands that were contracted for under the questionable authority of the War Department, because the War Department entered into these contracts after the armistice was signed.

Mr. KREIDER. Hundreds of millions of dollars worth.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is for the purpose of saving millions of dollars that have already been spent that it is necessary now to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars, and, in some instances, millions of dollars. It is like buying furniture on the installment plan and paying all but $7. By the failure to pay the $7 you lose the furniture. On failure to finish the payment for these lands the Government will lose all the money that it has expended already, and unwisely expended in many instances.

Mr. LITTLE. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs says:

> There is no doubt whatever that millions of dollars of the money which Congress voted for the conduct of the war and placed no restrictions thereon have been expended illegally and without warrant of law by the War Department in the purchases of land and the construction of new military posts since the armistice and without the express authority of Congress, as should have been the case.

Just exactly what the gentleman from Kansas says, and it is a unanimous report.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is not.

Mr. FIELDS. It is not a unanimous report. I am a member of the committee and it is not unanimous.

Mr. LITTLE. I am sorry it is not, because from all I can learn it should be. The gentleman from Nebraska says it is unanimous.

Mr. FIELDS. And there is matter in the report that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] agreed not to put in the report.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must observe the rules of the House, and not address the House until they receive permission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] for a question.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that the act of July 11, 1919, was designed by this Congress to affect contracts made by the Federal Government for a right of way for a railroad, for instance, that they graded, that they put the tracks upon, and that they used before the armistice was declared?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no information as to the specific question to which the gentleman from Delaware refers. If contracts of that kind were made, of course they were with authority, but other contracts that were made subsequent to the signing of the armistice are of questionable legality.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield to me to allow me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent that the minority have leave to file a minority report.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any minority report in here?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me explain. This report was printed only yesterday, and the minority members of the committee had no notice whatever of the character of this report. In justice to the minority members of that committee I ask leave to file a minority report.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not yield at this time for that purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any minority report here?

Mr. HARRISON. We have had no opportunity to file it.

Mr. LITTLE. I am sorry for you.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has some time remaining, and as I desire to close I will ask him if he desires to use his time.

Mr. GARRETT. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on the rule, but I desire to correct a statement that has just been made by gentlemen on the majority side, by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], I think, and by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], that this is a unanimous report. This is not a unanimous report. It was not printed until yesterday. I happened not to notice it in the RECORD, and I did not know that it had been printed until a few minutes before the House convened, nor did I know that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] was going before the Committee on Rules this morning to ask for a rule. I did not know, either, that the report contained certain language that is in it. I see on page 4, in the second paragraph, the following language:

> There is no doubt whatever that millions of dollars of the money which Congress voted for the conduct of the war and placed no restrictions thereon have been expended illegally and without warrant of law by the War Department in the purchases of land and the construction of new military posts since the armistice and without the express authority of Congress, as should have been the case.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] included that language in his report which he submitted to the subcommittee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] and I took issue with him upon that, and it was my definite understanding that that language should be omitted from his report.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will state that not only was the matter agreed to, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], as I remember it, voted with the Democrats on the committee, that those provisions be stricken out of the report.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Not now. I want to finish my statement.

Mr. LITTLE. But the gentleman has quoted me.

Mr. FIELDS. That was before we had made the trip to the Southwest and the West. This meeting of the subcommittee was after we had completed the trip to the Southwest. After the completion of the trip to the West I returned to Washington and remained here for a few days. The subcommittee was not ready to make its report. The chairman [Mr. ANTHONY] was not here. I had no notice of any further action on the proposition. I knew nothing more of it until I learned this morning that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] had asked for this special rule, but I did know, and I do know now, that my colleague from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] agreed not to include in the report the language that I have just read.

I have always regarded him as one of the fairest men in the House. I would not say anything disparaging of him personally, but I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, in view of the facts that I have stated that he has included in his report the language that I have just read.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. LITTLE. Of course, anyone examining the report would see no indications of a minority report, and that is, of course, what the House had to go by; but there are three specific items in this bill to which I direct attention, Camp Bragg, Camp Knox, Camp Benning. Does the gentleman not think that instead of generalizing about the proposition it would better help the House if he would just tell, not in any generalization but by specific direction, to the specific statutes, what authority somebody down in the department had to buy these three places——

Mr. FIELDS. I can not yield further to the gentleman at this time, but will do so in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. And if there has been violation of law, see that they are punished for violating the law?

Mr. FIELDS. Inasmuch as the subcommittee has not been called together and that I have had no notice of it, I desire to renew the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] that the minority have permission to file a minority report.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether that report will contain a specific direction of the attention of the House to the specific law under which anybody had authority to make these expenditures.

Mr. FIELDS. We will attempt in that report to be absolutely fair.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it the gentleman's idea of fairness that it shall tell us by what specific authority of law these men bought these lands.

Mr. FIELDS. Why, certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the gentleman says that the minority members of the Military Committee did not know what was to be in the report, because it has just been filed, and inasmuch as the Members of the House did not know anything about this bill, because we have had no opportunity to look at the hearings, would it not be a pretty good idea to defeat this rule so as to give an opportunity to file a minority report and give the Members of the House opportunity to find out something about the legislation.

Mr. FIELDS. I think if we can not get this consent that the rule should be defeated. I realize the necessity for this legislation. Men have been moved off their lands and are entitled to compensation for them. The legislation should be enacted, but if unanimous consent is not granted for the filing of a minority report I shall vote against the rule, and I hope that the House will defeat it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, what has become of my request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the minority may file their views. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Within what time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state for the information of the House that the report upon this bill was ordered by the Committee on Military Affairs over one month ago. The minority has had a month in which to prepare a minority report and file it, and the House ought not now to permit them to make amends for delinquency in that respect.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, is a request for unanimous consent pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] reserves the right to object.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I do object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did the gentleman from Kansas read this report to the committee?

Mr. ANTHONY. "The gentleman from Kansas" did not read this report to the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. Sometimes gentlemen do that and sometimes they do not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say to the gentleman that the question of the subcommittee which investigated these camps and cantonments making a formal report had been taken up at several meetings of the subcommittee and had been considered. I had prepared some material for such a report. Some of the language in that report was taken exception to by some of the members of the committee, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], and perhaps by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], as they state, and we dropped any idea of the subcommittee making a formal report.

And in this regular report which I made to the House in compliance with the orders of the Committee on Military Affairs I expressly stated:

The following extracts from notes made by the chairman of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Military Affairs are printed for information.

I think that clears the situation.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask whether or not the gentleman has legal advice from any department of the Government or from any lawyer that the contracts which the Government entered into in the cases which we have under discussion were illegal?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I guess in so far as the contracts go they were perhaps legal, those made before the armistice; but I will also say to the gentleman the bulk of the money expended at the three large Army camps and the cantonments covered by this bill was made after the armistice out of money which Congress appropriated for the conduct of the war and which I believe a majority of our committee think was illegally expended.

Mr. FISHER. I will ask the gentleman whether or not the money expended as suggested by him was not in improvements and not so much in the purchase of land?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is for both.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War came before your committee and asked the justification of Congress for his illegal expenditures?

Mr. ANTHONY. I had not intended to go into that at this time, when we are considering the rule, but in response to the gentleman from Nebraska I will state right here that way back in January the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War did come before the Committee on Military Affairs. He had evidently heard the criticism which had been made on the floor of the House about these expenditures, and he informed our committee that he believed, if I remember correctly, that he had the legal right to expend this money, but not the moral right, and he asked our committee——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. ANTHONY. And he asked our committee if it would give him informal authority to go ahead and complete the expenditures at these camps and posts. Instead of giving him that informal authority our committee informally approved the resolution which I had introduced into the House explicitly directing the War Department to cease such expenditures. Thereupon the Secretary of War and the department officials went to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and asked for the same permission to go ahead with these expenditures.

The Senate committee by a tie vote, if I remember correctly, refused to give this authority, and the story goes that subsequently a Senator from one of these States where these immense expenditures were being made went to the War Department and carried the assurance there that the Senate committee, if all the members had been present, would have approved such expenditures, and on that flimsy authority the War Department went ahead and further expended millions of dollars.

Mr. DENT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. DENT. Is not my colleague mistaken in this respect, that the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War came before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House last January and asked our advice, stating that they considered that they had the legal authority, but they wanted our advice, and we thought that was not a part of the duties of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. ANTHONY. What the gentleman states is substantially correct.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield? I understand the subcommittee——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. SNELL. I understand the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee has made a personal investigation of each one of these items.

Mr. ANTHONY. They devoted a great deal of time, not to every item but to most of them. It traveled over 8,000 miles of this country and personally inspected most of the propositions involved in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any possible way of getting that information before the House any better than to bring it up for discussion and let those Members give their information to the House at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know of any better way.

Mr. SNELL. That is the reason I was in favor of bringing it on the floor of the House and getting the information before the House and let the House decide as it saw fit.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me a minute or two more?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield one minute.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is not willing to waive the objection he made, or withdraw the objection he made, to the filing of minority views? Now, it seems to me, if the gentleman will permit, that he is doing the minority an injustice in not permitting them to do that. They do not ask for delay in the consideration of the bill, and, as I understand, all they are asking is permission to put in as part of this official report their contention as to the legality of certain matters.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to the filing of minority views, but I do object to criticism of gentlemen which were made on the floor here directed to myself when the gentlemen making the criticism have had over a month in which to file that report, and if anyone is responsible it is their neglect.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, this report was not printed until yesterday. Now, the attention of the Committee on Rules was not brought to the report, and there was no necessity for bringing it to the attention of the Committee on Rules, but I think there would have been a different feeling about this matter to some extent if it were known the minority had been denied the right to file their views.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman, I withdraw my objection to the filing of the minority views.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is pending the request for unanimous consent, and, reserving the right to object, there is no time set in which this minority report shall be filed. In all probability it will be filed after the House has acted upon this bill. There is nobody, as far as the House is concerned, who knows anything about the bill. We have not had any opportunity to learn about it, and now comes the request that the report shall be filed after the House is through with the measure. I object.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman reserve his right to object?

Mr. REAVIS. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, after all, the majority ought always to give the minority some rights. Here is a report which I think is an admirable report, but it in effect criticizes quite severely a Cabinet officer of the administration, and on the face of it it would appear that the minority Members of the House had joined in that report. Now, as a matter of fact, we know that the report of a committee is usually written by a member of the committee, and is ordinarily not submitted to the committee itself for revision. It seems to me that in all justice we ought to give the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs a chance to place themselves on record in reference to a criticism of a Cabinet officer belonging to their administration. I think the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] ought not to object. I think this report ought to be filed within a reasonable time.

Mr. FIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, we ask five days.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, there is no position that a minority member of this committee may want to make known that he can not make known during the discussion of this bill if the rule is adopted. I am not objecting for the purpose of depriving the minority of the right to make any expression of their views.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. REAVIS. I am objecting, Mr. Speaker, with the idea that it will contribute something toward the defeat of this rule. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is going to object in the end, why——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted under the rule for general debate be divided, one-half to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and one-half to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the rule be amended by giving control of half of the time for general debate to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and half to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. It seems as though that request ought to come after acting on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to amend that rule.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the rule provides one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half to be controlled by those opposed to it. I did not suppose the Committee on Rules would be autocratic enough to bring in a rule that all the time should be controlled by those in favor of the bill and give no time to those opposed to the bill, but the gentleman seems to want to do that indirectly which he would not have attempted to do directly. Suppose some one wants to oppose the bill, what chance will they get? I do not hear any response.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I did not know anybody was opposed to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There are lots who are opposed to the bill. It is one of the worst things that ever came into the House and ought to be beaten by a two-thirds vote. But I shall not object.

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If objection is made——

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair thinks there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those who are in favor of adopting the rule will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 259, nays 70, answered "present" 1, not voting 102, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8819.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8819. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8819, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8819, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8819) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in July last, when the Army appropriation bill was passed by this body, we placed on it an amendment which in substance limited the further acquisition of real estate at any of the Army camps or cantonments, and prohibited new construction at such places.

The reason for the placing of that limitation on the bill was that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Members of the House, generally, had become alarmed at reports to the effect that large sums of money which we had voted for the conduct of the war were being expended as late as eight months after the conclusion of the armistice for purposes connected with the training of the Army in time of peace, and for which clearly the War Department should have come to Congress for authority to expend before proceeding to do so.

In my opinion the placing of the limitation has resulted in the saving of millions of dollars to the Treasury of the United States, but in effect the limitation held up the activities of the War Department at every one of these places. Some of them were meritorious; some of them were not. In order to arrive at some conclusion in regard to the propositions which were meritorious and upon which the War Department should be authorized to go ahead, the Committee on Military Affairs appointed a subcommittee, which has devoted a great deal of time and attention to these matters, and which, as the result of its work, has brought before the House this bill, making specific appropriations out of moneys heretofore voted for that purpose, so as to enable the War Department to continue what we believe are necessary activities at the posts and points involved.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask why this bill is brought in in such a peculiar form? Apparently very little of the original bill is left. It comes in practically as a committee amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is due to the fact that the committee was compelled to recast most of the items and change the sums involved in many of them, so that in order to simplify our work we put our own items in.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I gather that the original bill was submitted by the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; and it was materially added to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the committee changed it largely because there was hardly anything left of the original bill. It is new, almost entirely.

Mr. ANTHONY. We did make radical changes in the bill.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. OGDEN. Was it not subsequent to the introduction of this bill that your committee investigated the camps?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was. We visited the camps for the purpose of securing information.

The situation at three of the largest propositions that are covered in this bill—points where there are from 50,000 to 100,000 acres of land involved—is that the War Department had already gone ahead and purchased from one-half to two-thirds of the land involved at each of these immense training fields, and when our amendment to the Army appropriation bill went into effect and suspended further purchases it left these propositions incomplete. The proposition presented to the committee and to the House was whether we should discontinue any further land purchases at those points, which meant the elimination of the training projects from the Army program, or whether we should permit them to go ahead and complete them. The committee is convinced, after careful investigation, of the real military value of some of them.

We feel that under the present conditions it will be cheaper and more economical to permit the Government to go ahead and complete the purchases which have been started, because if we abandon them the loss of the improvements and the bill of damages where we have contracted for land and compelled the farmers to move off their improvements and vacate their lands nearly a year ago will be nearly as great as the amounts involved in the purchases.

I want to show the House the situation at Camp Benning, Ga., as a typical illustration of the proposition that we are facing to-day in reference to Camp Benning, Ga., Camp Knox, Ky., and Camp Bragg, N. C.

At Camp Benning there are about 97,000 acres involved for a basic Infantry training school.

Previous to the armistice condemnation proceedings were started for the acquisition of the land, but after the armistice most of the money was expended for the purchase of over 60,000 acres, which has been completed. Our amendment adopted in the last appropriation bill held up the purchase of the balance of the tract, so that to-day the situation at Camp Benning is as is shown on the map, which I think the House will be able to see.

The black portion of the map represents the land which the Government has already purchased, 76,417 acres. The blue patches interspersed all through that black area are tracts of land which are under condemnation in the courts. The green patches are farms scattered all through that tract which the Government has contracted to purchase at a fixed price and which our amendment held up.

Most of the farmers on these scattered tracts have been compelled to move off their farms. The Government is in possession. On many of them the buildings have been removed or demolished. The committee came to the conclusion that if we do not go ahead and complete these land purchases the bills for damages to the evicted owners will be as great as the amount the land will cost us, regardless of the military value of the proposition, which we believe has merit.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman says most of the farmers have moved off from the tracts for which contracts of purchase have been executed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the blue spaces on the map indicate land which is under condemnation proceedings and the green spaces indicate land for which the Government has made purchase contracts.

Mr. REAVIS. What character of purchase contracts have been entered into?

Mr. ANTHONY. A contract between the Government and the owner for the purchase of the land at so much per acre.

Mr. REAVIS. Written contracts?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand written contracts.

Mr. REAVIS. Has the gentleman ever seen any of the written contracts?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I have seen copies of the contracts.

Mr. REAVIS. Do they call for payment within a specified time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not remember as to that, but they are legal contracts—as nearly legal as the department could draw them—on printed forms.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. What is the average cost of the land, and how much land is involved which has not yet been acquired?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are about 97,000 acres in the Benning proposition. The average cost of the land was about $33 an acre. Some of the land cost about $300 and some $15 or $20. The average cost is $33 an acre. In my opinion the value of that land to-day, in view of the rise in the price of farm lands, is $50 or $60 an acre, so that the Government has a clear profit in its land purchase if it goes through with it.

Mr. JUUL. How many acres must we still purchase in order to complete the enterprise?

Mr. ANTHONY. Without the purchase of these scattered tracts the Government can not avail itself of the entire area. About 75,000 acres have been purchased.

Now, I want to state to the House the purpose underlying the purchase of this big tract.

As one of the developments of the war it was found that Infantry can only be operated in battle under the protection of Field Artillery. Our General Staff believed it necessary that we should have a training ground large enough so that in the future our Infantry officers and the noncommissioned officers and as many of the men as possible could be trained under actual battle conditions, where the Infantry could be advanced over a large area of ground protected by actual barrages of artillery with the accompaniment of tanks which we propose to make an arm of the Infantry from now on, and all of the equipment which would go with Infantry in battle.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did the gentleman call attention to the small piece which it was decided not to buy?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a small tract of about 800 acres, marked in red on the map, situated on the Chattahoochee River, for which the department made a contract which it is believed can be canceled, that the committee thought the Government could dispense with, and we have agreed to eliminate the amount required for the acquisition of that one tract.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. I was not here when the gentleman began his remarks. Perhaps he has covered the point. In case we should decide not to provide for the purchase of this land, just what would be the condition of things and how much would the Government lose by not taking these farms?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman the Government has expended about $6,000,000 in improvements at Benning. We have built a post sufficient to house 5,000 men and 1,000 officers. The construction is 65 per cent completed and has cost a little over either $6,000,000 or $9,000,000, I forget which. The Government has built 9 miles of railroad from Columbus to the headquarters of the post. That railroad is built and in operation. If we do not go through with the purchase of this land at Benning—and I want to be frank and say that I was very much opposed to the proposition at the start and would not have approved of the location to-day if it was a new proposition—if we do not go through now with the obligation into which the War Department plunged us without asking our authority, the Government stands to lose almost the whole investment there.

The amount involved in the damages or claims for damages on farms that we have taken possession of, where the owners have moved off and have lost their crops, is as great as the money involved in completing the purchase of the ground.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What portion of this expenditure has been made since the armistice?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the greater part of the payments have been made since the armistice.

Mr. HULINGS. I asked what part of the improvements—buildings, and so forth—have been made?

Mr. ANTHONY. Practically all the improvements have been completed since the armistice. The first condemnation proceedings were begun on November 3 or 5, and the armistice was signed November 11.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. As I understand from the gentleman's report, he was very much opposed to the proposition, and I think he stated a few moments ago that he was antagonistic to this camp site.

Mr. ANTHONY. Originally.

Mr. HICKS. If we approve the purchase of this ground, are we not going to sanction an act on the part of the War Department which was probably unauthorized and not justified by the conditions?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was unauthorized. The main criticism in regard to the location of a basic training camp in the southwestern part of Georgia is the great expense which will be involved in the transportation of troops back and forth to that training ground. If the same terrain could have been found in the central part of the country, it would have been a much more valuable place for training.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Would not the result of the failure of the Government to complete the purchase and the restoration of the land marked in blue on the gentleman's map involve the loss of the whole ground for an Artillery or maneuver camp, interspersed as it is with private farms?

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely. The ground which the Government now owns would be absolutely worthless because it would be impossible to fire guns.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If we approve the policy which was unauthorized, would it not set a precedent that would justify future Cabinet officers in doing an illegal act and put the Government in the situation where to save itself it would have to approve it?

Mr. ANTHONY. The defense of this proceeding is that we were at war at the time this proposition was initiated, and that Congress had placed no string on the money which we had voted and which was available.

Mr. REAVIS. I am not asking what defense the War Department makes. What I ask is if in the judgment of the gentleman we approve of this illegal assumption of authority in this way, is not it an invitation for further conduct of the same character in the future?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. I think the publicity attendant on this very Benning matter will be a deterrent in the future to any Cabinet officer intending to make such an expenditure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman state in what direction from the camp the city of Columbus is situated?

Mr. ANTHONY. Right up there [pointing on the map].

Mr. McKENZIE. Did the gentleman travel over this area?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee went over the greater part of the area. The night we arrived at Benning there was a terrific downpour of rain and we thought it would be impossible to get out over the land, but they took us there in automobiles, and we went all over it. The character of the ground is a sandy loam, and the heaviest rain does not turn it into mud. That was one of the arguments in favor of it—that it was available for military maneuvers every day in the year.

Mr. McKENZIE. Whether or not it is true that a number of public roads of long standing lead from the outlying country in the city of Columbus and pass through this camp site?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; there are some roads.

Mr. CALDWELL. Only one; the other roads have been abandoned, and this one under an agreement between the county commissioners of the two adjoining counties is subject to be closed up whenever it is being used by the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not speaking about roads abandoned or shut up; I am asking whether or not there are not roads that are now open.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are a number of roads; but I saw no highly improved roads on the reservation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman state about what time the Government obligated itself to purchase the bulk of the land in black on the map?

Mr. ANTHONY. The lands were being purchased, or in the process of being purchased, at the time we passed the limitation on the appropriation bill July 11. They started to purchase them in November, initiated the condemnation proceedings only a few days before the armistice.

Mr. CRAMTON. At the time of the armistice we were not obligated to purchase anything, except that condemnation proceedings had been inaugurated.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from New York says yes, but I think we could have stopped the legal proceeding at any time.

Mr. CRAMTON. And at what time did we become obligated to purchase those lands that are in green on that map?

Mr. ANTHONY. Those contracts were made subsequent to the armistice.

Mr. CRAMTON. And prior to——

Mr. ANTHONY. Prior to July 11 last.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may be a little hazy in my recollection, but it seems to me that it was stated to us when this matter was before the House, not only that this was not authorized, but that something in the nature of an understanding or assurance had been given the gentleman's committee that the War Department would not proceed with this matter as they did afterwards proceed. Is not that the fact? In other words, that there was something of a breach of faith between the War Department and the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. To the best of my recollection there was no promise to our particular committee that no further work would be done. I have been told, however, by members of the Committee on Appropriations that representatives of the War Department had appeared before that committee and had assured them that no further expenditures would be made, but that they were made regardless of that statement.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think that is what I had in mind.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not my purpose to take up in the time allotted for general debate the merits of the various other propositions in the bill. We will discuss them when we come to them under the five-minute rule. I want to make a general statement, that perhaps three-fourths of the items covered in this bill are for the purchase of land, as shown here, at a good many of the storage depots and manufacturing plants, where the Government has expended millions for improvements and has contracted to buy the land itself—which is common business sense—to go ahead and buy the land to protect the millions of dollars of improvements that we have already placed there, unless the Government wants to sacrifice about half a billion dollars' worth of property.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has stated that most of these projects are to save the Government from losing money that it has already expended on the land.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For the purchase of the Dayton-Wright plant and real estate at Dayton no money has been expended by the Government as yet.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the Government has an investment there of $960,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not that on the McCook Field?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; that is a separate proposition. We propose to abandon it. The Government does not need it, and it is inadequate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. McCook Field was leased to the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That lease expires in 1927.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know the date.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have that information here. Is not the Dayton-Wright plant that they want to sell to the Government owned and controlled by the same people who leased the McCook Field, who now want a release of the McCook Field, which has enhanced in value, and to sell us the other land?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that those lands are all controlled by interrelated corporations, all connected with the Dayton-Wright outfit.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And we are expected to fall for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I doubt if we do any falling. I shall take five minutes to explain the Dayton-Wright situation, since the gentleman from New York has brought it up. At the beginning of the war it was decided that the Air Service ought to have an engineering and development experimental plant. They went ahead and expended about $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 at Langley Field, Va. After they expended all of this money they found that they could not get any of the skilled labor which is absolutely essential in that kind of work, so that the proposition was a failure and all of these millions had been expended for nothing. They could not get anywhere after they built the plant. Then they moved to McCook Field, at Dayton, Ohio, which is the center of a large amount of highly skilled labor. They leased the old baseball park there, and some adjacent land almost in the center of the city of Dayton, and erected thereon about $2,000,000 worth of temporary buildings, which they are using as their experimental engineering and development plant. There have been a great many fatal accidents at McCook Field, surrounded as it is by the buildings of the city, where they are testing out machines in process of experimentation. It is apparent to the merest tyro that goes there that it is an unsafe flying field. The Air Service wants to get out of it. The Dayton-Wright people have 5 miles from Dayton a splendid modern factory building, which they erected to carry out their various contracts with the Government. They spent $1,000,000 for a modern factory building on a tract of land 5 miles from Dayton, in the Miami Valley, surrounded by a beautiful area of flat land, absolutely available for aviation practice work.

We put on top of the Dayton-Wright expenditure there $960,000, all of which we stand to lose, except $64,000, the amount which was allowed by the board of appraisers in relation to the amortization, as settlement of their war contracts, unless we take that plant over. It will cost about $7,000,000 if we build an entirely new engineering plant, and we provided that amount of money in the appropriation bill to enable the Air Service to do it. They can acquire the complete plant at Dayton by utilizing the old Dayton-Wright buildings and purchasing adjoining factory buildings and lands at a cost of about $2,700,000. There is an economy of $5,000,000 in the purchase of the Dayton-Wright plant instead of building a new one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman stated that there was about a million dollars' worth of buildings on this land.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the original cost of the Dayton-Wright people, on the original Dayton-Wright tract.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we proposed to pay eight hundred and some odd dollars an acre to the Moraine Development Co.——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And can the gentleman tell me how much the development company is asking for that land?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I remember, it is about $800.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I have a telegram here from the county clerk that the assessed value of that land is $85.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not tell anything about that, but I went all over that land in the vicinity of these plants, and I know what farm land is worth, and every foot of that land in the Miami Valley is worth from three to four hundred dollars an acre for agricultural purposes alone.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Better let it be used, then, for agricultural purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. In view of its proximity to the great manufacturing city, it would be worth the amount of money the Government proposes to pay.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I understood the gentleman to say they have practically abandoned Langley Field. Is that correct?

Mr. ANTHONY. Abandoned it as an engineering development plant.

Mr. HICKS. Not for flying?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are using it for some minor purposes.

Mr. HICKS. I know the Army has ousted the Navy, and I thought if they had abandoned it we might get it for the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. We would be glad for the Navy to have it.

Mr. HICKS. We would be glad to take it. Now, a further question——

Mr. BUTLER. Do we have to pay for it?

Mr. HICKS. We do not. They have ousted the Navy from Langley Field. I notice here in reference to the item for Langley Field they are asking for the purchase of additional real estate and acquisition of oyster rights. Will the gentleman kindly tell me what is meant by the acquisition of oyster rights?

Mr. ANTHONY. One of the members of the Committee on Rules this morning wanted to know if that meant that Members of Congress would be enabled to go down there and get oysters. But the situation is that the Langley Field was used for the development of aerial gunnery and bomb practice, and they found that because of the dropping of bombs from the aeroplanes over the oyster beds that some of the owners of the oyster beds, who had paid the State of Virginia for them, had complained because they were blowing up their oyster beds, so the military authorities concluded that we ought to buy those oyster beds from the oyster owners before we proceeded with aerial gunnery practice, and we are allowing the item for that purpose.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. Can he tell the committee what his committee proposed to do relative to aviation? How many fields are we going to have, and how are they going to be selected?

Mr. ANTHONY. I could say in a general way the Air Service has organized and picked out about 15 fields, if I remember correctly, which they propose permanently to retain as base fields. Here it is: The Air Service has 12 fields——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAZARO. Could not the gentleman have a little more time in order to finish answering the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is fixed by the rule. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is to have control of the time in opposition? Is the gentleman from Alabama opposed to the bill?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the time shall be controlled by some one in favor and some one opposed.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is no one opposed——

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] be permitted to control the other half of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama—the Chair does not think that request can be put to the House under the provisions of the rule.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I object. I am opposed to the bill and I desire to take the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] requests that he be given control of the time in opposition to the bill. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is one important feature of this bill which I propose to discuss. At first it may appear local. It refers to Camp Eustis in the State of Virginia. I realize that this committee is not concerned with a purely local question, and if this were only a local issue I would not take up the time of this committee. The bill proposes to abandon and dispose of Camp Eustis, Va. Its retention is a national necessity. Why do I make that statement? Camp Eustis is the only camp in the United States that is designed for heavy mobile and railway artillery and for the training of forces for coast defense with such artillery. Camp Eustis is located in easy proximity to the only Coast Artillery school that is maintained in the United States. I refer to the Coast Artillery School at Fort Monroe, Va.

I have no doubt that it will be agreed by the members of this committee that the day of fixed defenses is passing. It must be admitted that, as a necessary corollary to the use of railway artillery in land operations in the last war, it was shown beyond a doubt that it was a necessity for coast-defense purposes. I want to call the attention of this committee to the very important fact that of all the camps that have been inspected by the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs Camp Eustis alone has never been visited. The committee has never been on the ground. There is not a line of testimony in its hearings concerning the importance of this camp or its necessity in coastal defense. The members of the subcommittee visited Camp Benning, they visited Camp Knox, they visited the various other camps that are covered by this bill, but they have never been on the ground at Camp Eustis and they do not know to-day anything about the needs of that camp as a military necessity.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the committee stated, or, rather, some one stated, that they had traveled 8,000 miles in visiting the various camps. I want to ask the gentleman, even though they traveled 8,000 miles, unless they were military men themselves, how could they tell on a casual visit to a camp whether any particular camp was needed or not by the United States Government?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I do not know that I can answer that question, but I think I can answer this question, if propounded by the gentleman, and that is whether any person of average intelligence going to Camp Eustis would decide that it was a national necessity? I believe that every reasonable person, whether of military training or not, would so decide, and to-day men connected with the Army of the United States would welcome an opportunity to come before the Committee on Military Affairs and tell them of the advantages of Camp Eustis. I have myself personally been before that committee, and I have said to them, "If you do not care to go down at the expense of the Government, I extend to you an invitation to go down to Camp Eustis at my expense and ascertain its advantages." I have been there very recently and I know that it is designed to train men to use the heavy mobile artillery upon moving water targets as well as upon land targets. The proposition that is submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs in this bill is to transfer the heavy mobile and railway artillery from Camp Eustis to Camp Bragg.

Gentlemen, are you training your Army for the invasion of a foreign country? If not, what benefit will follow from your training at Camp Bragg? Our Army is for defense, and our primary aim is that no enemy shall land on our shores. Is not your coast line the logical line of your defense? Is not that the reason why the Congress of the United States has readily appropriated funds for the construction of an adequate Navy? Next in importance to an adequate Navy in the protection of the coast line is the utilization of your heavy railway artillery, moving, as it will, from point to point wherever the attack may come. I submitted as my first proposition that the day of fixed defenses is passing; I may say also that the day of fixed harbor defenses is passing. The enemy, according to reports that would be filed by officers of the Army if there were a hearing on this subject, and according to the conclusion of every reasonable man, may select and will select his own point of attack, and will not choose to send his navy, if he is attacking this country, upon the particular point that you have selected for your defense. If that is true, if your Navy must meet the enemy on the high seas where the enemy chooses, so on land you must meet the enemy where the enemy chooses to make his attempt to land. You have in your heavy mobile and railway artillery moving forts that you may carry up and down your north and south Atlantic coasts. That artillery in part is now at Camp Eustis. By ferriage to Norfolk you are in immediate touch with the entire south Atlantic seaboard. By ferriage to Cape Charles you are in immediate touch with the entire north Atlantic seaboard. By railway through Richmond, Va., you are in immediate touch with both seaboards. You have about forty-two 14-inch guns and many 16-inch railway guns that are under construction. According to present plans all are to be carried to Camp Eustis. There they will be kept for the defense of your coast and at that camp your soldiers will be trained to use these guns. It is proposed, however, to transfer these guns and all operations with them to Camp Bragg, N. C.

Gentlemen, upon what moving targets will you train forces to use heavy mobile and railway artillery at Camp Bragg, N. C., unless possibly upon the jack rabbits that may be found at that camp? Camp Eustis is located on the James River for a distance of, I should say, approximately 6 or 7 miles, possibly longer. It runs along the James River. Adjacent to Camp Eustis and practically a part of it is another firing ground, which is known as Camp Wallace. This camp is located above Camp Eustis on a bluff and on the James River. It is located at such a point that it may fire at fixed targets on Mulberry Island, a distance of 15 miles away. There it is firing over water or land that belongs to the Government, and not over private land.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman assume that there will be any great amount of firing done by these enormous guns, wherever they may be located?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I think, if not from the larger guns, there will be firing from the smaller guns, because the very purpose of the camp is to train the men who will be sent there to fire on land targets located as I have described, and, in addition, to train them also to fire on moving water targets as they are towed up and down the James River for a distance, as I am advised by the authorities, of at least 10 or 15 miles and possibly more.

Mr. WHALEY. And is it not the custom at all these forts to have semiannual practice of all their big guns?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Of course it is. It is so at Fort Monroe. The guns are fired there at moving water targets. The efficiency of the Navy is due largely to similar practice, for which large sums are expended annually. I will say to the gentleman further, that in addition to the operations at Camp Eustis, there has been established a fort at Cape Henry, known as Fort Story, and it, too, is a part of this training center.

The heavy guns will be placed also at Fort Story, and for the purpose of greater freedom in fire heavy guns on railway mounts will fire out into the Atlantic Ocean at moving targets. Immediately in touch with Camp Eustis is the balloon school, while only a short distance away—I should say about 27 miles—there is the flying center, known as Langley Field. Camp Eustis is connected by concrete roads with Fort Monroe, and both are under one command. Written reports exist showing Camp Eustis to be an ideal location for the very purposes for which it was designed, but these reports have never received the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I was wondering how the distinguished gentleman from Virginia was able to get all of these concessions in his district?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I did not get them. These camps were located by the War Department for the same reason that Newport News was established as a port of embarkation and debarkation. The determining factor for each location was its strategic position, and particularly its proximity to the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. I do not claim for myself the credit of having gotten these things. They were gotten before I ever came to Congress, and they were gotten because of the necessity for them.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he is seeking to reinsert into the bill the matter contained in lines 18, 19, 20, and 21 on page 4 of the original bill. Is that correct?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I am seeking to reinsert that language, and also to strike out the language that appears on page 7, lines 18 to 25, wherein it is provided:

That no part of the unexpended balances of appropriation heretofore made for the support of the Army shall be expended for construction at Camp Eustis, Va., and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to sell the real estate and buildings of such camp to the best advantage of the Government, the proceeds of such sale to be covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Then I am correct when I say that you aim to strike that out and to reinsert?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia what is the amount of the Government investment there now? How much would it cost to remove it to some other point?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I was just coming to that. Without investigation, without going upon the land, with absolutely no information before the committee on which to base its report, it undertakes to strike out Camp Eustis, designed for the purposes I have indicated, and constructed at an expenditure of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000. I understand that the Government has already expended there over $12,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand from Gen. Coe, who is the Chief of the Coast Artillery, that about $21,000,000 has been spent there.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I think that is too much. In arriving at the figures $21,000,000, Gen. Coe includes also Langley Field. The costs of the project at Lee Hall, Va., are: Reservoir guard camp, $85,960; Camp Wallace (upper firing point), $1,258,952.50; Camp Eustis (proper), $11,026,938; a grand total of $12,371,850. Langley Field is about $8,000,000. These figures are taken from a report that was recently submitted.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that, including Langley Field, which is used in connection with the Coast Artillery construction, there has been expended about $20,000,000.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. That is correct. But I must hurry on, gentlemen. There are many reasons that I could give why this place should be retained, and I will refer to some of them later. Before doing so I must consider briefly the action of the committee in striking out that portion of the original bill which provided for the payment for land. This provision is contained in certain language which has been referred to by the gentleman from Illinois. It has been said on this floor that this bill is intended primarily to pay for land taken before November 11, 1918, and for which the Government is under moral obligation to pay. I went before the Committee on Military Affairs some time ago with one of these claims, aggregating about $8,000. If settlements are made in full, the total amount necessary to be paid will be only $42,000 or thereabouts. When I went before the committee I was given to understand that some investigation would be made. That investigation has not been made. There are no hearings, so far as the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is concerned. However, if you will turn to the hearings which were had in the Senate on a similar bill you will find the exact figures itemized. There is shown specifically the amounts that ought to be paid for land, and Col. Kuldell says—I refer to page 131.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield there, does that include all the lands that were condemned by the Government?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes. I am going to read Col. Kuldell's statement.

Mr. LAYTON. Where can I get that report?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. You can get it from the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. I read from Col. Kuldell:

These maps show the location of those tracts. They were not purchased simply because the title was not clear, and it was necessary to go into court to get clear title. The prices were all agreed on, but title is not clear. The names are on the attached list. The tracts are necessary because this is a firing range, and it is not possible to have individual owners own private tracts within an artillery range.

The CHAIRMAN. The facts in connection with all these different details for which authority to purchase is now sought were in the record of the last hearing?

Col. KULDELL. They were brought out yesterday by Gen. Coe himself.

Senator KIRBY. It seems that condemnation proceedings have already been instituted against these tracts?

Col. KULDELL. Yes, sir.

These items are all detailed on page 131. The particular item that I was interested in was the largest item in the list. I was interested in this item because the former owner had written to me directly. The property had belonged to a lady who was out of possession, having been compelled to move off the land when the property was taken. She has been off the land since June, 1918. Gen. Coe, with reference to the same subject, says:

There are a few parcels of land included within the limits of Camp Eustis which the Government purchased and which has been occupied by troops since 1918 and which had been evacuated by the former owners sometime previous to July, 1918, and we took the whole camp site over in March or April of 1918 and occupied it continuously since that time. There are a few parcels of land within the camp limits in regard to which either condemnation proceedings have not been completed or in regard to which the title rights have not been satisfactorily investigated. The total area of the camp is 7,394 acres, and the cost of the land to date has been about $600,000.

Col. Kuldell, however, showed that all the condemnation proceedings had been concluded.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask what opinion the gentleman got from the War Department in the way of a legal opinion as to the determination and right of the Government to pay for lands that had been condemned and taken over?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I have had no opinion from the War Department.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The Congress holds the purse strings, and notwithstanding the fact that the executive department is authorized to start proceedings to acquire land, unless we give them the money they can not pay for it.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Certainly. Now, I want to proceed.

Provision should be made for the payment of these just and moral obligations. Whatever the ultimate conclusion as to Camp Eustis, these bills should be paid.

But should Camp Eustis be abolished? I will undertake to state briefly many reasons why such action should not be taken.

Camp Eustis is the only home station and school of fire for all railway artillery, now a part of the Regular Army.

The day of fixed defenses is passing, and the need for railway artillery is greater in coast defense than in land operations.

Our coast is the logical line of attack and in its defense our Navy constitutes our first line. Our second line of defense consists of heavy railway artillery.

The function of railway artillery in land operations is the destruction of railway centers, ammunition dumps, railway bridges, and fortifications.

The function of railway artillery in coast defense is the destruction of rapidly moving ships at sea.

Distances are deceptive on land, but far more so on the water. When defending the seacoast the objects of fire are rapidly moving ships and smaller craft at sea. To fire successfully on these targets special training is necessary, and for this reason there is frequent practice at forts and in the Navy. There must be moving targets on the water, and battle conditions must be created as nearly as possible. Moving targets are not available at Camp Bragg. That location is remote from the seacoast. Camp Eustis, Va., is the only camp located close to the seacoast. It is ideally located.

It has a large reservation safe for long-range practice at land targets and also at water targets. As the targets are towed up and down the James River, guns located 4 or 5 miles from the shore, occupying concealed positions, may fire at these targets, from which they are distant 8, 10, or 12 miles. Observers in towers already constructed may direct the fire or report the effect. Observers located along the shore may follow closely the accuracy of the fire.

The guns may be turned in a northward direction and fire upon moving targets in Chesapeake Bay at a distance of 20 or 25 miles. The troops in training may be sent to Fort Story, at Cape Henry, for greater freedom in firing at water targets, and there need be no limit on the scope of their operations.

There are 23,000 feet of standard-gauge storage tracks for railway guns, locomotives, ammunition cars, and so forth, and 90 per cent of the work is complete.

There are 8,000 feet of standard-gauge firing track already provided at Camp Wallace, and material for 5,000 additional feet is on hand for spurs and sidings leading to the various gun positions.

A fire-control system is already provided and nearly complete, consisting of five steel towers, each 120 feet high, and all connected by subterranean and submarine cable with the necessary telephone connections to provide a terrestrial fire-control system, with the work 98 per cent complete.

There is a balloon school adjacent to Camp Eustis equipped to provide balloon observations, all necessary hangars, and so forth, being complete and in operation.

Machine shops have been provided to meet the emergency conditions during the war, and plans are on foot for enlarging these shops to meet all the necessary conditions for a permanent organization.

The camp is conveniently located to obtain skilled labor on account of its proximity to the large shipbuilding plant at Newport News, Va. It is connected by concrete road with Fort Monroe, Newport News, and Langley Field, being about 35 miles from Fort Monroe. It is about 5 miles from the Navy mine depot and about 7 miles from Yorktown. About 5 miles of concrete and 9 miles of gravel and slag roads have been completed in the camp. It has ready water transportation by a 17-foot channel down James River to Newport News, with light draft inland waterway up Warwick River from the camp to James River and near Newport News. It has railroad connections with the main line of Chesapeake & Ohio, so that material and supplies can be placed on storage tracks and alongside of warehouses within the camp, and can be delivered to ship side on pier. It has an excellent pier, which has been built into the James River at a cost of $500,000. It has ample space in barracks and storehouses for a brigade of railroad artillery under normal peace conditions, and by utilizing buildings and building material on hand, but not required in permanent development, the camp can be converted into a permanent brigade post at a minimum of expense. The number of troops that can be quartered at Camps Eustis and Wallace are 18,750.

It forms a part of a great national training center connected with the Coast Artillery School at Fort Monroe, Va., the only school of that kind in the United States. It is located in easy reach of the entire North Atlantic and South Atlantic Sea coasts. It is located within easy reach of the great naval base on the Hampton Roads, and also of the Army base at Norfolk, Va.

Located near one of the strategic points of the Atlantic coast, Hampton Roads, Va., it is the logical center for the concentration of thirteen 16-inch guns, forty-two 14-inch guns, and twelve 16-inch howitzers already under manufacture for the United States.

The immediate appropriation needed to complete the purchase is only $42,198.23 for purchase of real estate and $9,156 to complete incinerator, making a total appropriation of $51,354.23.

If abandoned, not 15 per cent of the investment will be realized, and the only training provided for railway artillery will be for operations on land and not on the water.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you dispose of this camp, on which you have expended something more than $12,500,000, you will not realize one-tenth of that sum. You will lose the only camp destined for the development of your heavy mobile and railway artillery, and so located that troops may be trained in its use on moving water targets as well as on land targets. The location near Fort Monroe has double value considered in connection with the Coast Artillery School there, because the regiments to man the guns would be concentrated upon the camp site near the range. They would conduct fire with aeroplane observers from Langley Field, Va., and with balloon observers from the balloon school at Lee Hall, Va., contiguous to this camp.

The records of the Army, if consulted, will show that when Camp Eustis was located at its present site due examination and consideration was given to various sections, but they were eliminated from consideration for the reason that none of the other localities possessed all of the essentials.

On the east side of the James River, however, was found this site, which possessed all of the necessary requirements and fulfilled the conditions precedent required for a site for the school of fire. It is close to the aviation experimental station at Langley Field. It adjoins the balloon school. It is close to Fort Monroe and the Coast Artillery School there. Land ranges from zero yards to ten thousand yards are easily obtainable. The location is such that these ranges can be increased from time to time almost indefinitely at a minimum expense. With the long-range firing point located at Camp Wallace, which is the upper end of a huge bend in James River, a 20,000-yard range is secured, and the fire across 10 miles of water reduced the acreage to be acquired to a considerable extent. The territory can be easily patrolled, there being only one road leading to the camp.

The fact that this site possesses so many physical advantages and is so close to the entire teaching staff and theoretical plant of the Coast Artillery School at Fort Monroe argued for permanency, and consequently the lands were purchased or condemned with that end in view.

The same reasons which justify expenditures for harbor defenses and their maintenance justify the continuance of this camp. Yet I am asking now for no additional appropriations except a comparatively small sum to pay for a few acres of land; nor am I asking for the adoption of a permanent policy. All that I ask is that the direction to abandon and salvage the camp be eliminated until you shall have made an examination and until you shall have had full hearings. I do not claim the gift of prophecy, but I do predict that if you abandon this camp you will soon establish a similar camp near the seacoast at a cost equal to, if not greater than, the cost of this camp.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be is enacted, etc., That the paragraph under the subheading "United States Service Schools" under the heading "General Staff Corps" of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, amended——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. This bill strikes out certain sections or certain paragraphs and provides for the insertion of new matter. My inquiry is, Is that all one amendment, and if so, will the bill be read by sections for amendment, or will it be read in its entirety and then an amendment offered to it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the situation of the bill is perhaps as the gentleman from Georgia calls attention to. So far as the committee is concerned, it is willing to have the bill read item by item and considered by paragraphs for the intelligent discussion of the Members of the House.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the gentleman will ask unanimous consent. I want to offer an amendment, and some other gentlemen desire to offer amendments, and I have made this inquiry with a view to defining the method of procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state for the information of the committee that there are two sections to this bill, and that under the rule the bill will be read by sections.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent that each project mentioned in the bill be considered as a separate paragraph for the purposes of amendment and debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that each project of the bill be considered as a paragraph for the purposes of consideration and amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object to the request—this bill is wholly an amendment to an appropriation act. It is true it is legislation amending an appropriation act. If the appropriation act itself were in the form of a bill before the House for consideration it would be subject to certain rules of the House in reference to amendment. I do not ask the Chair to rule upon that question at this time, but is this bill being considered under the rules of the House providing for the consideration of legislative bills or under the rules of the House providing for the consideration of appropriation bills? Of course, if it were being considered under the rules of the House providing for appropriation bills it would be read by paragraphs, unless the rule were modified by unanimous consent. If it is being considered under the rules for legislative bills, it will be considered by sections. The question is whether a committee which is bound by certain rules of the House about the insertion of items not authorized by law, or certain items of legislation in an appropriation bill, can bring in a bill to amend an appropriation act and escape those rules. I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this an appropriation bill or a legislative bill?

Mr. TILSON. Legislative.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not want that to be decided one way or the other by consenting to a unanimous-consent request, though I do not object to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Kansas that each paragraph in the bill shall be considered as a separate paragraph for consideration and amendment. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that there is one committee amendment here, a single amendment in which there are several items.

Mr. ANTHONY. My request is that each project be considered as a separate paragraph.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, let us know what that means.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. For instance, on page 3 of this bill is an amendment, or under this request there may be a dozen amendments or more on the subsequent pages striking out certain lines.

Under the request of the gentleman from Kansas is it understood that when the first item on page 3, under the heading of "Infantry," is reached, to strike out lines 8 to 11, inclusive, it is to be considered as a separate amendment and be discussed for 10 minutes or an hour before it is disposed of, and then that each of these other items is to be considered as a separate amendment covering several pages and several dozen projects before we reach the item at the top of page 6 to complete the Infantry school at Camp Benning? In other words, the committee has reported an amendment which strikes out the original language of the bill relating to the Infantry school at Camp Benning, on page 3, and proposes to insert an item on page 6 relating to the Infantry school at Camp Benning. If you are going to consider these two items, do you dispose of the item on page 3 before you reach the committee substitute on page 6?

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendment proposed by the committee was to strike out all of the words through which lines are drawn and substitute therefor the new paragraph.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand that.

Mr. ANTHONY. And it would be in order to have considered as one amendment the proposition to strike out that language.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would be the case under the ordinary rules of the House, possibly, but the gentleman has requested that these items be considered individually and severally.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is, when we reach their consideration.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would require the consideration of the amendment to strike out two or three pages before you reach the amendment to insert in place thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would throw the House into such confusion that it would not know where it was on anything.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee amendment would be to strike out on page 3 all of the matter indicated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Supposing gentlemen desired to discuss that, if the gentleman would ask unanimous consent to consider the bill with the committee amendments as an original bill by paragraphs, would not that take care of all the gentleman desired?

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will yield, it will, as far as I am concerned, but I think might not so far as some other gentlemen are concerned. I think there are some parts of the bill stricken out that the committee substitute does not refer to in any other part of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would it not be in order to offer those items as amendments?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. CALDWELL. Would they not be subject to points of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You can see what confusion you would get into the other way.

Mr. JUUL. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if, under the rules of the House as they exist now, it would not be possib'e, for instance, to move to strike out on page 3 and then proceed to page 6 and substitute the language there, and finish each project as we go along?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would not come up as a committee amendment in that way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it was the intention of the committee to have the substitute bill considered as the committee bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not comply with the rule.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But that is not the gentleman's request.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was the intent of the gentleman's request, in accordance with the request submitted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would it be in order to prefer a request for unanimous consent that for the purposes of the consideration of the bill the matter submitted by the committee amendment be considered as the original text and that it be in order to substitute for the proposed amendment any of the matter stricken out in the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That request would cover the case.

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the rules of the House there would be the right to offer any amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, let us be perfectly clear about it. If the House has agreed to the committee amendment to strike out an item, it would not be in order without the consent to offer that same item again.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. BRAND. That is what the committee is doing; it strikes out some items and reinserts the same items.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is one amendment as a substitute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the request for unanimous consent be so modified as to allow the committee to proceed to the consideration of the bill, with the agreement that the language submitted by the committee as an amendment shall be considered as of the status of original text and that the matter stricken out by the committee as an amendment may be in order in the form of an amendment to be offered from the floor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Or any part of it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Or any part of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. BRAND. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state the request. The request is that the bill may be considered on the theory that the amendments offered by the committee shall be considered as the original text.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And that the proposed amendment of the committee striking out matter may be in order, or any part of it, in the form of amendments proposed from the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. And that any part of the bill stricken out by the committee may be offered as an amendment from the floor. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, would it be in order to offer an amendment after one paragraph is read as a new paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think it would.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will not object if that is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that would be in order.

Mr. BRAND. Reserving the right to object, then the bill would be read by paragraph rather than by section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. By sections.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I couple with the request that it be read and considered by paragraphs instead of by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. And that the bill be considered by paragraphs. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCKENZIE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on December 10, 1919, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 6857. An act to authorize the change of the name of the steamer Charlotte Graveract Bricung to T. K. Maher.

REMOVAL OF LIMITATION FOR PURCHASES OF LAND AND CONSTRUCTION IN MILITARY POSTS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the paragraph under the subheading "United States Service Schools" under the heading "General Staff Corps" of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, amended by substituting the words "the Infantry School, Camp Benning, Ga.," for the words "the Infantry School of Arms at Fort Sill, Okla."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that the controversy arose on the discussion of the rules concerning certain things that were said in the report on the bill. I for one have never felt and do not feel now that the Secretary of War or any of his agents have violated any law or have done anything that was morally wrong in the matter of the acquisition of these camps and their development. I have studied the matter very carefully and was a member of the subcommittee that visited the camps, with the exception of the one in Ohio and one in northern New York. I was present when the subcommittee discussed the question of whether or not anything wrong had been done by the War Department, and maintained that there was not, and it was agreed that that matter would be left out. I am very sorry that it was put in the report, but that is water that has passed over the mill.

The question is whether we are going to do that which we ought to have done many months ago. Are we going to release the hands of the War Department that we tied at a time when the personnel of the House had changed and it was felt on the part of some Members that we should go slowly in all of these matters?

The circumstances are these: During the war we built up the foundation of a military machine and we were just getting out of the foundation stage of that great structure when the armistice came. When the armistice was signed the War Department was confronted with the proposition whether or not they would throw away what they had, or whether as a business policy we should salvage what we had, whether we should keep that which we should need in the future and turn that which we did not need in the future into such available cash as possible or abandon the whole, and whether we should stop all development at great loss or complete the necessary things under construction.

With that idea in view, studies were made by the highest experts of the War Department. We found that there were 19 camps in the United States that we did not need, 14 of which were National Guard camps and 5 special camps. It was found that in the contemplated preparation for defense of our country, which should be maintained in time of peace, there would be no immediate necessity of these camps upon which the Government had spent in some cases several million dollars.

They were not strategically located and perhaps there was a surplus, and so orders went out to demolish the camps, salvage them, sell the property, cancel the leases, and that was done. It was found in the survey that there were 27 camps that the experts of the War Department felt that it would be wise for one reason and another to retain and develop. Some of them because the investment was very large and we could not get the money out at this time in any other way, and some of them because they were absolutely necessary for the future defense of our country and the future training of our armies. We found in the war that one of our greatest weaknesses was that there had never been any real training of Infantry or Artillery in the United States Army. You could not train infantrymen by having a squad or company of them do the manual of arms sufficiently to enable them to take care of themselves in battle. The art of war consists of two things, to kill the enemy first, and, second, to save your own life if you can in the operation. All the training that the American Army had had, in all of the time in the past except when it was in actual battle, had been limited entirely to teaching the men that skill which would enable them to kill their enemy, and practically nothing has ever been taught to the American young man in respect to how to take care of himself and prevent the enemy from killing him. As a matter of fact, we have held it up to our boys in the past that danger was the thing that they were to accept and to seek, and was such a small consideration that it should not give them any concern. However, now we find it is much cheaper and much more humane to teach our boy how to take care of himself, and that it will take fewer soldiers to whip our enemy if we do that thing. For that reason Gen. Pershing early in the war began sending cablegrams to the United States insisting that we find here in America some place that would compare with the terrain of the battle fields of France.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. He sent one cablegram, I think, away back in September, 1917. Not having any result from that, he sent another and another and another, until finally in his cablegrams he not only urged that this be done, but he pointed out that the American young man was being trained to defend himself in actual battle, and that they would die by the thousands and the tens of thousands if the American Government failed to give those boys the proper training here to which they were entitled before they were sent away, and he named two men of the United States Army who had had the proper amount of training and skill to put in charge of that kind of a plan, and when his insistence became as hard as it did, and when that cablegram was received here, the War Department ordered that steps be taken immediately to acquire such a camp, and Camp Benning was acquired. We may say the same thing about the camps for the Artillery.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. What was the date of this cable from Gen. Pershing wherein he told that the soldiers were dying by the thousands because of lack of training?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not remember the exact date, but it was within two months of the signing of the armistice. I can put it into the RECORD, for I have it on my table in my office. I can also put in a copy of three of those cablegrams, which I have in my office, and I shall be very glad to do so. The same thing may be said in respect to artillery. Never before in the history of the world had it ever been known that artillery was such a weapon of defense as it is. It has always been recognized as a weapon of offense. It was always used to destroy and tear down the enemy and his embattlements, but never before was the defensive barrage used as it was in this war. When it was discovered that the artillery could be used in that way, and when that great man, Maj. Gen. Summerall, laid down the barrage that thrust the Germans from the battle field, America made up its mind that from that time on it would profit from the brains of Gen. Summerall and never again would our boys go without the protection of adequate field artillery. Then it was designed that we would have a training field on which the Artillery could be trained, a field large enough for the Infantry, the Artillery, the Cavalry, and the tanks, and all the balance. This bill was proposed to carry out the scheme of the War Department. Certain members of our committee felt that they would not be justified in authorizing these enormous expenditures without an investigation personally of the committee. The committee went to a number of these camps. The gentleman from Virginia stated the fact when he said that we did not visit Camp Eustis. It was not on the program and we did not go there. At that time, so far as I am concerned, there was no intention of dispensing with Camp Eustis. I understood that it was as necessary for the Coast Artillery as either Camp Bragg or Camp Benning is for the Army, one for the Infantry and the other for the Artillery. I believe it ought to be kept. I have never been in favor of dispensing with Camp Gordon or with Camp Taylor. I believe those camps are necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CALDWELL was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when I first read the report of the committee that accompanies this bill the first thought that arose in my mind was to congratulate the minority members of the committee upon the fact that they had not seen fit to file minority views. I now find, however, that gentlemen on the minority side, part of them members of the committee and part of them possibly not, see fit to undertake to defend the utterly indefensible proceedings of the War Department with reference to the purchase of lands for these camps, and, for my part, if they want to undertake anything of that kind, it meets with no objection whatever. I would like to see any such report. I would like to have it spread before the American people, so that they could a little more fully understand just what has been going on.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the objection came from the Republican side of the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am quite well aware of that, but it did not come from me. On the contrary, I would like to see such a report printed.

The first paragraph of the bill provides in effect for the abandonment of Fort Sill for certain purposes and the substitution therefor of Camp Benning, Ga., which is near the city of Columbus, as I understand it. What are the facts in relation to it? What do we have at Fort Sill? We have some 55,000 acres and a Government reservation adjoining, of which no use is being made, of some 65,000 acres more, where, according to good Democratic authority, if you wanted it not merely for musketry but for an artillery practice you could have 25 miles or more as range for the guns. Fort Sill is high and dry, and upon it has been spent somewhere around $2,000,000, if not more, in public buildings and improvements.

It was an ample space, ample for all purposes for which Fort Benning was designed.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. CRAGO. I know the gentleman wants to be fair with reference to that, and I think he is largely misled by some erroneous report. Gen. Snow, who is in command of the Field Artillery and also in command at Fort Sill, said:

> The Infantry School of Arms and the School of Fire for Field Artillery were both stationed at Fort Sill for a considerable period of time, but it was learned definitely that there was no sufficient room in the Fort Sill reservation to accommodate both these activities. There is no question that if the Infantry School of Arms is returned to Fort Sill, it will become absolutely necessary to move the school to some other place.

The fact was they used the entire area around Fort Sill for a school of fire.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman I would like for him to make that statement in his own time if he kindly will. I am making my statement on reliable information from gentlemen who have been to Fort Sill, and I do not agree with the report just read. Some Army officer can always be found who thinks, and probably honestly believes, that the Government should have more land.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not agree to the report of this officer. I would like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] explain, when he comes to explain, how with 55,000 acres right there and the 65,000 more in the Government reservation, which could be used, that there was not room——

Mr. CRAGO. I was trying to explain. We put in the entire day witnessing the maneuvers of the school of fire, and we were convinced it was no place for an Infantry school.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is easily convinced, it seems to me. I can not go into the details on that, but even if there was not room for the Infantry school what reason was there for purchasing additional ground?

Mr. FIELDS. A great deal of the reservation was so rough they could not use it for an infantry field at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My information is not the same——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Conceding everything these gentlemen say, conceding Fort Sill is not sufficient for the purpose of the school—and I do not concede it, but I can not go into details with reference to Fort Sill here now, as it would take 15 or 20 minutes' time which I do not wish to consume—what happened in reference to this matter? The Secretary of War shortly after the armistice appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. He asked the consent of the Committee on Military Affairs to go on with this project at Fort Benning and other projects. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House declined to give it. He then went before the Senate committee and asked for their approval. A resolution of approval was introduced and failed to pass the Military Committee of the Senate. He came back to the House and informed the House, according to the record I have, that all proceedings in reference to the purchase of land at Fort Benning had been discontinued, and then the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, satisfied that no further proceedings would be undertaken with reference to the camp at Benning, gave no further attention to the matter at that time. I understand the Military Affairs Committee contemplated passing an express resolution forbidding any more money being expended in that direction; but about that, however, my information is not positive. As soon as Congress adjourned, what happened?

The War Department went on with its purchase of land at Benning, went on making its contracts with these men, which it is now claimed we must complete. It is now claimed the owners have been compelled to leave the land. If they return they will have large claims for damages. Now, what justification can there be for getting the Government in such a position? If they did not have the land at Fort Sill, they had abundance of land at other places for an Infantry school and Artillery school. There was no need for the purchase of this land at Benning.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will, although I would like to finish in the five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask for another five minutes, if necessary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not like to take it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman accept the opinion of Maj. Gen. Wood as to the availability of this place?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Availability of what place?

Mr. CALDWELL. Benning, as against all other places in the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did the gentleman join in this report? Can he state as to the inaccessibility of Benning and——

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I did not join in the misstatement; I joined in the proposition it was necessary to have Benning. I ask the gentleman again. Will the gentleman accept the opinion of Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood as to the availability from every angle of this camp?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows perfectly well I have not said a word to indicate that Benning could not be used for this purpose. What I have been asserting was that the Government already had thousands of acres that could be used for that purpose and was not being used, and yet, nevertheless, the War Department insisted upon the purchase of this land at Benning.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman take the opinion of Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood as to the availability of any Government land anywhere in the United States for this purpose?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the general has not expressed any opinion of that kind.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask, Would the gentleman take his opinion if he had expressed it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will not stand here and bandy words with the gentleman. I decline to yield further.

Mr. CALDWELL. He has. Will the gentleman take it if he has?

Mr. CANNON. Will it be a boy or a girl? [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois has given the gentleman the answer to which he is entitled. There are Infantry fire schools scattered throughout the country. I know something in reference to that subject myself. With all the thousand of acres that the Government possesses there seems to have been a determination to locate this camp at Benning. So far as the lay of the land is concerned, it may be well chosen. In other respects it is not well chosen.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest it is exactly that factor in the lay of the land that determines the military value of any training camp?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, to some extent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is, in view of the topography and not in view of a blue-print paper.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I wanted to take the time to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question, in view of what was asked, namely, whether there is only one place in the United States where you could train Infantry to fight in a real battle, unless you have an opportunity of selecting the land where the battle is to be fought, confining it to a mere little plain down at Benning? If they were trained there for real battle, could they fight a battle anywhere except at the training camp?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly not. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is nothing more absurd than to say that you can not pick out more than one place in the United States that is suitable in which to train troops. And there is nothing more absurd to me, though not claiming to be a military man, that training upon some particular location or some place that is selected by the Army officers is necessary to fit our troops to fight in some other place where the topography is altogether different. Gentlemen talk about rough places. That is where battles are generally fought; but you can find any kind among the thousands of acres now owned by the Government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest this: One of the desirable things about Benning is that it offers the greatest variety of terrain, so that a man may have the experience that may be duplicated in battle anywhere else.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You have got that at Fort Sill also.

Mr. CRAGO. No; you have not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You have at Fort Sill ground both rough and smooth. I insist that the purchase of the Benning tract was a wasteful and needless expenditure of the public money at a time when, of all times, we ought to be economical.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] suggested that he has a telegram that he will insert in the RECORD from Gen. Pershing, which states, as I understood him, that thousands and tens of thousands of young men were dying in France because of lack of military training of the proper character. This was two months, he says, before the armistice, about a year and a half after war was declared. It would appear that we may take it for granted that there were thousands and tens of thousands of men who died for reasons for which they should not have died. If they were dying for lack of military training, and the general is correct, that is the most fearful indictment of the management of the War Department and the training given the men by the officers of the Regular Army and those who helped them that was ever drawn. If that is true, those men who did that training and had a year and a half to do it in should be held responsible. It may be that he is mistaken; that the loss of thousands of young men may have been due to bad management and poor generalship. I have also heard that intimated. At least, I hope the telegram will go into the RECORD and we will have an opportunity to reach a conclusion one way or the other. If it were due to either, I think it is somewhat remarkable that anybody should come here and ask us to spend millions of dollars to build training camps in which those very officers can turn around and train men again. If during a year and a half of preparation they could not put men on the battle field with the reasonable facilities for taking care of themselves, what sense would there be now in spending money to give them a lot more of camps and more opportunities to train young men to get slaughtered? It does not appear to me as being intelligent.

There is a fallacy here in this argument somewhere that these gentlemen have not accounted for. The conditions they have stated are determinative as against them. If those people failed in their training, they are not entitled to another chance to train a lot of more boys.

It has been suggested that the peculiar topography of this place would be determinative of its value. Of course, there are lots of places in the United States just as good as this, and if this is the only place that is fit, we had better quit.

That is only an observation thrown in for a stopper for a moment. We want to find out whether this specific money ought to be appropriated. I have not ascertained yet to my satisfaction whether it should or not. If they legally bought this ground, and they made the Government responsible for it, I am in favor of paying for it whether it is good or not. If, on the other hand, some fellow, in violation of authority, but with Congress winking at it, violated the law and involved us in a silly expense, but in that way involved private citizens and put them in a position for us to help them, I would go ahead and help them. In either event I would vote for this bill. If, on the other hand, neither condition obtains and yet anybody is injured, it should be settled by some one of the rules under which we authorized the Secretary of War to settle $4,000,000,000 worth of unliquidated damages, and let them go ahead and settle under that. It can be done. You gentlemen in the Sixty-fifth Congress authorized the Secretary of War to pay out upon his own volition about $4,000,000,000 to settle a lot of unliquidated damages. I did not vote for it. But if there are a lot of such unliquidated damages at these camps it might be cheaper for him to settle under that. He need not come to us for any more. If there was a moral injury there through our carelessness, I will vote for the bill. But nobody yet has advanced any argument on that point at all that I have heard.

We now approach the question of the value of these camps. That these camps are better than any other camps in which to train soldiers, of course, is not urged very seriously. There are thousands of places, any one of which is just as good as another. That we should go skipping around the country and spend a lot of money foolishly in building up new camps is not reasonable, either.

You may give the soldier all the training you want to, but you will never know whether he is a successful soldier or not until he has been under fire. There are certain simple things that have got to be taught to every soldier. It takes some time, of course, to do it. But when he has learned that, the rest of it comes in a battle or two, and he is either a soldier or he is not. You speak of special training.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent for another five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. If you have got something extra to teach them, who is going to do it? Nobody has taught them anything yet, according to Gen. Pershing's telegram, as I understand it. Who is going to do all this teaching? Where are the boys going to learn anything if they did not in 18 months?

The other day a gentleman came into my office who had served in a regiment in the Philippines, to which he was much attached. He served abroad in the Great War in a Regular Artillery regiment and came home with a good record. He said to me, "Our regiment did not have any better men and did not have as good officers as the old regiment in which I served in the Philippines." "But," he said, "The men were very much better prepared and equipped." I said, "In what way?" He dodged that question half a dozen times. Finally I said, "Confound it, in what way?" "Well," he said, "there were men there who understood wireless telegraphy." That is all he could say. I said, "Good God, we had several good telegraph men and operators in our regiment in the Philippines." That is all he could say.

After you get beyond a certain point, gentlemen, there is very little knowledge of the real art of war to be had except on the battle field, except in certain technical branches like engineering and artillery. But beyond that there is not very much to be taught that can be learned before active service. It has all got to be learned on the battle field. That is where a knowledge of those things is to be acquired. You give me a man who has not had any training at all, and let me throw him into a good regiment, and let him go through two or three battles, and he will soon be a very good soldier, if he has the right stuff in him. That is where the soldier comes from. Every boy ought to have an opportunity before he goes to war to carry a gun and march around and learn to shoot and learn how to take care of himself, but war is like everything else: You have got to go through some of it before you can cut much of a figure in it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. If a man can get training for battle by engaging in a miniature battle or participating in a miniature battle and undergoing a barrage, and all that, is not that good training?

Mr. LITTLE. Well, you can explain the principles of physics to a young man in school; also wireless telegraphy; but until he has worked them out in actual practice he does not know anything of value about them. There is no place in the world where a man can learn to be a soldier as well as in an actual battle. It is all right to march around and call out orders on parade, and it looks very fine. And it is all very well to burnish up your gun until it looks fine. But you never know whether you are a soldier or not until you hear the bullets whistling over your head.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not want to annoy the gentleman, but does he think we ought to have Mexico as a training field and drill ground for teaching the boys to fight? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Well, it might help some. [Laughter.]

If some gentleman can tell me what legal right these fellows had and to what we have been legally bound, I will vote for this bill. So far as Mexico is concerned, of course, Gen. Grant and Gen. Sherman and Gen. Lee and Gen. Longstreet and nearly every other great soldier in that great Civil War who received distinction learned everything he knew that was useful on the battle fields of Mexico. That is where they acquired the resources and experience that made them great officers.

But after 40 years of billions squandered on alleged military preparedness this last greatest of all wars has failed to furnish the greatest of all commanders, and the most distinguished of its generals furnishes no name that echoes loud to the trump of fame. The most distinguished soldier alive to-day, the most brilliant military leader now living, is a volunteer soldier of the great Civil War, a general who fought at the head of his troops and knew no tactics that kept him far in the rear. For no man who marshaled the hosts on the plains of Europe has achieved a reputation to excel that of this last great commander of our own war, the civilian soldier, Nelson A. Miles. What expert has written his name among the stars that illuminate the skies of history higher yonder in glory than our companion of Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Thomas, Gen. Miles? [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Suppose certain contracts were entered into, and the Government agreed to pay money for the property and has not paid for it after the people have given up possession of the property. Will the gentleman vote for the bill to make good those contracts?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but I suggest that Secretary of War Baker can settle those claims under the authority we have already given him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not quite agree with my friend from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] that we do not need any training of soldiers in time of peace or that any training that we may be able to give them in time of peace is practically useless, nor am I quite willing to go with him so far in the other direction as to take all of Mexico for a military training or drill ground for the training of our soldiers. What I shall have to say on this bill will be solely from the military standpoint, as to the value of and the necessity for acquiring the property in question as an Infantry school. We now have no Infantry school, except the one at Camp Benning, in the United States. We have a number of Artillery schools—Fort Sill, Camp Knox, and Camp Bragg for Field Artillery; Fortress Monroe for Coast Artillery. Two of them are appropriated for in this bill.

Now, bear in mind that the Infantry is the Army. The other arms of the service are simply assistants, just auxiliaries. The highest service that they can perform is just to help the Infantry. In the first place, the Infantry is two-thirds of the Army in numbers, and in the end the ultimate victory must be put over by the Infantry. In the last analysis of the battle, it is up to the "doughboy." All the others must help him, and they perform most important work in doing so. At the present time we have no fully equipped school in this country for the training of Infantry officers and noncommissioned officers in the vital subject of the use of firearms. We ought to have one.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Did we not ever have an Infantry school?

Mr. TILSON. We had one before the war at Fort Sill, a fairly well-developed Infantry school.

Mr. CANNON. It is still there?

Mr. TILSON. No. It has been removed from there, and the plant formerly occupied and used has been taken over entirely by the Artillery school.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri and Mr. GREENE of Vermont rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. TILSON. I yield first to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if every one of these camps is not an infantry training school?

Mr. TILSON. In a sense they are, but not schools of fire. Unfortunately nearly all of the camps throughout the country were so located that there was no ground for actual fire practice. It was so in the Spanish-American War. My own regiment never had a chance to fire a rifle until we had been in camp for months and the war was over.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What did you do?

Mr. TILSON. We did the close-order drill and the extended-order drill on the parade ground and on such other little patches of ground as we could find around the camp.

It was developed in the last war that more than anything else the Infantry needs training in actual firing. They can get some valuable elementary practice shooting at targets on the short ranges, but for advanced training must have the kind of facilities we hope to have at Benning.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think what my colleague would like to state is that there is a distinction between the camp training and the discipline of the soldiers in units, and that coordination of the Infantry with the auxiliary arms which is only to be had in battle.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes. The training in the camp is the elementary training which all soldiers must have to begin with.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a short question. My time is very limited.

Mr. BEGG. I do not wish to detain the gentleman, but ex-Speaker CLARK brought out partially what I wanted to ask, and I want to go a step further. Are we to understand that the only excuse for this new Infantry school is to have a place to fire the guns?

Mr. TILSON. Yes, in a sense; if you go far enough in describing what you mean by "firing the guns."

Mr. BEGG. All right. Now I would like to ask another question, if the gentleman is willing to let it rest at that.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman may ask me a question, and I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. BEGG. What is the necessity and where is the good business in spending millions of dollars for these three camps in different parts of the United States to take care of training an Army of approximately 300,000 or less, which we will in all probability have, if what the gentleman has said regarding the purpose of this Camp Benning proposition is true?

Mr. TILSON. It does not seem to me that the things referred to by the gentleman have any necessary bearing upon this matter at all. This school is for the higher training of a soldier in the use of firearms. This is where he goes after he has had the elementary training that he received in any of the other camps in the use of the rifle.

Mr. BEGG. Then they take him down there to teach him to shoot?

Mr. TILSON. Not only to shoot but to teach him to coordinate himself with the other arms of the service. At least he ought to be taught to shoot not only at fixed ranges but over varied ground at unknown distances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more, because I would like a little information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I shall be glad to answer any question that I can, and then I should like to proceed.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman said that in addition to teaching the soldier to shoot the purpose of this was to teach him to coordinate with the other branches of the Army?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I am not a military man by practice or by study, but my understanding is that men are trained to obey orders, and that the officers of the Army know how to function one department with the other without a special place to go down and play this game of war in actual practice.

Mr. TILSON. In my judgment, the proposition as stated by the gentleman is not correct or tenable. I do not believe that any officer or man can learn theoretically by study or lectures anything like what he can learn by actual practice on the field. I believe that it is absolutely necessary to have ground over which soldiers may be trained to meet as nearly as possible the conditions of modern warfare.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman give the committee the benefit of his trip to Camp Benning? He is familiar with that. Will he tell us what he thinks of it?

Mr. TILSON. I shall be glad to do so. I had the privilege of being at Camp Benning for two days, and was thus afforded an unusual opportunity of examining the ground in question. If the committee will bear with me, I shall try during the remainder of my time to give them the benefit of my observation.

Having established the position that we must have a school of infantry—that it is absolutely essential—then there remains only one question: Is Camp Benning a proper place for it? In my judgment, taking it all together, it is one of the best places I have ever seen for the purpose. The nature and variety of the terrain is such that it gives an opportunity for as much and as varied training as any ground that I have ever seen anywhere.

In the first place, it has excellent places for the short and long measured ranges. It is difficult nowadays to get a range, even a limited, fixed range, because the high-power guns now used will shoot over into the next county, so that it is necessary to pick out a place where people do not live in the immediate vicinity, and that is not an easy thing to do in populous communities.

Next to be considered is the character and topography of the ground. Camp Benning satisfies every necessary requirement in this regard. There is plenty of level land, plain or plateau, for the encampment of troops or for the erection of buildings. There is gently rolling ground for minor maneuvers or for firing unknown distances. There are hills and valleys and streams. There are ravines and short ridges. There are patches of woods and small clearings. There are extensive fields and considerable forests. In fact, the ground itself is admirably fitted for the use of all the arms of the service in connection with the Infantry. Tanks and airplanes can be used, as well as Cavalry and Artillery. Practice on movable targets, a very useful thing for training infantry as well as artillery, can be carried on effectively on this ground.

The soil itself is well adapted to the purposes of a camp or maneuver ground. It is not only sand, loam, and sandy loam, but, as I saw it, there are places where there is clay. There is even swamp land. Some streams have high, steep banks and still others low banks. In fact, there may be found on this immense tract of land stretches of country much like what might be encountered in any rough region where troops might be fighting.

It should not be forgotten that there is an abundance of drinking water, plenty of firewood, and an unlimited amount and variety of engineering material for the use of an army in camp or on the march.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If this appropriation is made, will we get one continuous block of land? Will there be any intervening land belonging to other people?

Mr. TILSON. There will be no intervening land at all. It is contiguous to Columbus, Ga., and I think it monopolizes about half a county there. It is admirably located, near a city of considerable size, and yet there were not a great many people living on the land. There were enough, however, to have produced houses and clearings and roads and other objects usually found where civilized men make their homes. There is plenty of woodland and there are numerous clearings. In fact, there is a terrain as varied as it has ever been my privilege to go over, and there is enough of it so that problems of a complicated nature may be worked out.

Mr. CALDWELL. There is a railroad and a river and a road.

Mr. TILSON. It seemed to have nearly everything that is needed for the purpose intended.

In taking over this land I do not wish it understood that I approve of everything that has been done in connection with it. I leave that part of the discussion to others. I am simply taking conditions as they exist to-day. We must have an infantry school, and I think that this ground will make an excellent place for such a school. We now own most of the land, and, whether we use it or not, will have to pay for it, or more than pay for it, in damages, besides causing our Government to appear in the attitude of abusing its great powers in the unwarranted treatment of unoffending citizens. I am in favor of keeping the land and making a great school there.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. My recollection of the statements made during the appropriation legislation for the War Department is that there was a feeling on the part of a few of the Members of the House that there had been waste and extravagance in the purchase of certain property for sites, and that it had gone even further, even to the extent that some officials of the War Department had exceeded their authority. I notice that the committee report before us says, on page 4:

> There is no doubt whatever that millions of dollars of the money which Congress voted for the conduct of the war and placed no restrictions thereon have been expended illegally and without warrant of law by the War Department in the purchases of land and the construction of new military posts since the armistice and without the express authority of Congress, as should have been the case.

I would like to support this measure. I have been impressed with the arguments made by the members of the committee as to the desirability of a camp like Benning, but at the same time, basing it on the fact that some of the purchases were made illegally, how are we going to vote for it without putting our stamp of approval on the illegal acts of certain officials of the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. The answer to that is that the committee is taking the situation as it finds it, with the fact that these immense plants have been acquired. We have either to take it and utilize it or sacrifice it. If we sacrifice it we place a far greater financial loss on the Government than if we utilize it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If we do this, do we not place a premium on and make it more easy for some official in the future to do what the officials have done in this case?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that such a condition could only arise if we had another war, when Congress might be swept off its feet and vote large sums, but if such a condition does arise, I, as one Member of the House, would never consent to vote a dollar without specifying how it should be spent.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman from Minnesota loses sight of the people who dealt with the Government and who in good faith parted with their property. In other words, to emphasize the argument that the gentleman has been making, he would allow these people to go without any relief whatever, because he is afraid of putting a premium on these acts of the officials which he says is illegal, and yet he would allow these poor people to go without any relief.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The "gentleman from Minnesota" does not lose sight of the poor people, whether they live in the State of Texas or elsewhere; but the "gentleman from Minnesota" feels that when the committee asks the approval of the House on a proposition of this kind, accompanying that request with the statement that millions of dollars have been expended illegally, and without accompanying that report with a suggestion that steps be taken against these officials of the War Department who have expended the money without authority—if we approve of it without doing anything, they will be doing it for years with the same impunity. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the committee has under consideration any recommendation to this House to proceed against the men who have acted so illegally?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suppose if any official has violated his oath of office, his responsibility under the Constitution, he can be impeached, but I do not know how we can do more than close the door after the horse has been stolen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Are we to understand that with the knowledge upon which the report was made the committee proposes not to make any recommendation to this House as to what should be done with these men?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The statute law which existed prior to any emergency appropriation for war purposes provides a check against misappropriations of money by any official of the Government. If anyone wants to invoke that law he can do so, and it would provide for this set of circumstances.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, I hope this committee will pardon me for referring to the little flare-up we had a few minutes ago. I want to say that I did not in the subcommittee approve of the expression "illegally and without warrant of law." I am opposed to its use now. That is a pretty harsh expression. For the chairman of the subcommittee I have the highest respect. In so far as the membership of the House is concerned, there is no Member of the House more thoroughly advised on military affairs than the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. As a newspaper man, he is one of the best editors of the Middle West. But when a question comes up as to the legal construction of a contract, and whether expenditures are made within the authority of law, I must admit that I would go to some one else before I would take his opinion about it. [Laughter.]

I have seen a number of attorneys who have examined the contracts and who are familiar with the laws under which the War Department operated, and I have talked with them concerning this matter, and they, without exception, have stated that the things that were done by the War Department were not illegal and were not without warrant of law.

I think the committee ought to have been more careful than to use such an expression, because, as a member of the committee and as a Member of the House, having used that expression, and if I thought it true, I would have felt it my duty to have made a report not only to the House but to the Department of Justice that it might institute two proceedings—one for the recovery of the money spent and the other for the prosecution of those who committed the illegal acts. I simply wanted to state my position upon this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, on the subject of Camp Benning, I thought the other day that I had brought the attention of the House to the subject in such a way that each man could investigate for himself. I confess that most of our committee went to Camp Benning with a prejudice against it. We were converted to the idea by our actual personal investigation. I do not want anyone to decide a question like this without knowing the facts, and I want to take time to read a letter here regarding this and the Fort Sill proposition from Lieut. Gen. R. L. Bullard. No man stands higher in the American Army, I take it, unless it be the commanding general himself, than Gen. Bullard, the man who led troops in action and who studied this question from every angle. He went to Camp Benning and made a personal study of the project, and here is what he said:

SEPTEMBER 15, 1919.

From: Lieut. Gen. R. L. Bullard.

To: The Chief of War Plans Division, General Staff, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Location of Infantry School of Arms.

I. I was stationed at Fort Sill, Okla., before the war for some two years, and have hunted and traveled over the whole post reservation and wood reservation.

II. I have visited and thoroughly traveled over the ground of Camp Benning, near Columbus, Ga. I have lived a number of years, winter and summer, near Camp Benning and know the climate.

III. I have served 32 years in the Infantry. I was the head of a board of officers for the selection of sites for Infantry schools of arms in France in 1917, and did select and start three such schools.

IV. Neither the post reservation nor the wood reservation of Fort Sill is suitable for an Infantry school of arms for the following reasons:

1. Lack of variety of terrain.
2. Lack of water, streams, etc.
3. Lack of artificial features, like houses and farms, open spaces, places of wood, bridges, etc., which would liken the ground to that over which Infantry must expect to act.
4. Too great ranges of temperature, extreme and oppressive heat in summer and extreme cold with winds in winter, which seriously interferes with training.
5. Inadequate space.

NOTE.—There was inadequate space for the school at Monterey, Calif., and with the Field Artillery School at Fort Sill, there will not be room for the Infantry school of arms, either on the post reservation or at the wood reservation.

6. Lack of natural bullet and projectile stops.
7. Lack of brush, trees, and other material for the construction of Infantry shelter in combat and in the trenches. This is very important.
8. A dry, hard, packed ground, making the construction of trenches, dugouts, etc., very laborious.

And I want to say right there that I think you can get a better view of this proposition when we realize that the men who went down there, Members of this House, and who saw it, instantly changed their minds as to the value of the project and its purposes, and became warm supporters of the project. It is the idea to put a complete division in training there, an Infantry division, consisting of every arm of the service, which goes to make up a complete division, with the aircraft, the artillery, every arm of the service. They have sufficient area there to move that division about, and in that movement to use every arm of the service for a full day, and then go into quarters for the night, and be off again the next morning. Returning again to Gen. Bullard's reason for Camp Benning, I quote from his letter:

V. Camp Benning is the most suitable piece of ground that I have ever set my eyes upon, for the location of an infantry school of arms, for the following reasons:

1. A very great variety of terrain, including gentle and steep hills, wooded spaces, open spaces, farms, houses, river, great creeks, small streams, etc.
2. Plenty of good water.
3. An immense quantity of brush, trees, saplings, and forest material for the construction of Infantry trenches and shelter in open and in stabilized combat.
4. Soil suitable for the easy construction of trenches and dugouts for the use of Infantry in open and in trench combat.
5. Ample spaces for the staging of all kinds of Infantry combat.
6. Plenty of natural bullet and projectile stops that would prevent danger to the inhabitants of the surrounding country.
7. A moderate climate, which will enable work to be kept up winter and summer, and all winter and summer.

I doubt that another piece of ground equal to Camp Benning for the location of an Infantry school of arms could be found within the limits of the United States.

R. L. BULLARD,
Lieutenant General, U. S. A.

I want to say that it had rained all the night before the day we arrived there, and yet we saw that in the early morning, notwithstanding the rain, you could have started troops over that area and kept them in motion. It is very rarely that you find that kind of soil over which to operate troops.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give us the date of that letter?

Mr. CRAGO. That letter is dated just after his return from an inspection of this project, September 15, 1919. Let us look this matter squarely in the face. The project should have been started before it was. It was started early in November, and was in its infancy when the armistice came. The men who owned the land thereabout were taken from their farms, the schoolhouses were torn down, the churches and little villages were removed from the land, and these men have contracts with our Government, and they should be paid for their land. We have cut this appropriation down from something over $2,000,000 to a little over $700,000. We do this in order that we may pay these men for their lands and finish a part of the buildings, and complete the work where 80 and 90 per cent of it is complete, and let Gen. Farnsworth go ahead with the Infantry school at that place. Then, if it is not what we want, we will have done only what reasonable business men would do in a like situation, and have protected ourselves in the investment that we have already made. We have more than $6,000,000 invested there now, and by an expenditure of $700,000 we can carry on this project for a time and at least demonstrate its value to the country.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know how much money we had expended on this on the 11th day of November, last year, or had contracted to expend and were legally bound for?

Mr. CRAGO. I think practically all of these contracts were let before that. The proceedings for condemnation were started, my recollection is, on November 2, 1918, but that was after they had bought vast areas of this land, and the project of something at Camp Benning had been in process of incubation for more than a year.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that condemnation proceedings makes it binding upon the Government?

Mr. CRAGO. Condemnation proceedings coupled with a direction upon the part of the court and the Government for the occupants to move out. They simply used the war power in driving these men off their farms and out of their homes. Condemnation coupled with that would certainly make us liable for damages.

Mr. LAYTON. And especially where awards had been made.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; especially where awards had been made.

Mr. LAYTON. And been paid in part.

Mr. CRAGO. Paid in part, that would be legal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the statement made by several gentlemen on the floor of the House that if it could be shown that the War Department had authority to enter into these transactions, or if it could be shown that innocent third parties would be harmed by not passing this legislation, they would vote for it. I wish to call the attention of the committee, therefore, to the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House last January, when this question was first presented to that committee.

Mr. Crowell, the Assistant Secretary of War, stated to the committee:

> I will say we are not asking for legislation, but merely presenting these matters to you for consultation and advice. We have all the legislation now that we need.

At the conclusion of his testimony I asked him this question:

> Mr. Secretary, it has been suggested to me that you put into the record a statement showing the authority or the statute under which you acted in making these contracts for the purchase of the sites at Camps Benning, Bragg, and Knox.

He said he would, and included in his statement the following:

> There were included in the estimates submitted to Congress for appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, funds for the acquisition of land for camp sites. Funds were appropriated and are available for the purchase of sites at Camps Benning, Bragg, and Knox under the following: "Barracks and quarters * * * for grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes * * *." (Public, 193, 65th Cong.) The Judge Advocate General has held: "There is authority in the appropriation for 'Barracks and quarters' to purchase lands necessary for military purposes, * * * it is the view of this office that the appropriation 'Barracks and quarters' may be legally used for the purchase of the land."

Now that is the authority on which the Assistant Secretary of War told the committee himself last January that he was acting in the purchase of this property.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Alabama, of course, would not have the members of the committee understand that that construction could be put in peace times; but during the war that is true.

Mr. DENT. I will state to my colleague from Illinois that, as I recall the fact, this particular language, "For grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes," and so forth, was new language put in the appropriation bill during the war for war purposes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. What would be the difference in construction in peace times and war times of that particular language? I do not understand the gentleman's answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENT. I can answer the gentleman. I did not state that there was any difference in peace or war times. I stated, as I recall it, that this particular language was incorporated in the Army appropriation bill during the war because of war purposes, and this is new language to what is ordinarily used.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The distinction of the practice in war times and in normal peace times is that in peace times, instead of using those words, we make that language as specific as the English language can make it as to where every dollar is to go.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will yield, and if the gentleman needs more time, I will try to get it for him. Right on this very proposition when we had Secretary of War Baker before the subcommittee on camps and cantonments, I asked this question:

> Mr. Secretary, if the course pursued in relation to this Camp Benning were followed in peace times, what barrier would there be between the War Department and the people so far as involving them in the expenditure of public money is concerned?

Secretary Baker answered:

> Of course, this could not have happened in peace times, Mr. McKENZIE.

Mr. DENT. Well, I do not know exactly what the Secretary meant——

Mr. McKENZIE. Here is the point, if the gentleman will permit me. Notwithstanding the fact that the armistice had been signed, we were not yet at peace and had simply left the door wide enough open to slip through.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will yield for one further question. The gentleman, I believe, was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at the time this particular language he read was incorporated in the bill?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I would ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. When that particular language was inserted in the bill did the officers of the War Department who appeared before the committee and asked for the insertion, in order to justify the insertion of that language in the bill, state at the time that they intended to establish a camp at Camp Benning?

Mr. DENT. They did not.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did they indicate where they were going to establish any camps?

Mr. DENT. There was no specific indication of any location.

Mr. HASTINGS. So there was no specific authority?

Mr. DENT. No specific authority, but they asked for it under the general authority for war purposes. Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, that answers the question as to the authority under which the War Department acted in these transactions. As to the question of innocent third parties who purchased these lands and who were removed therefrom, I wish to call the attention of the committee to these facts. In July—I think July 2, 1917—Congress amended the condemnation laws of the United States by a bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House so as to provide that when the Government instituted condemnation proceedings for the purpose of acquiring land for military purposes during the war the Government might take immediate possession of the property upon the institution of the proceedings.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield right there and let me ask a question? What obligation rested upon the Government under such circumstances?

Mr. DENT. The only obligation that rested upon the Government was to make this just compensation under the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. LAYTON. Therefore the Government has the right to pay the awards under those proceedings if they have been made?

Mr. DENT. I think so.

Mr. LAYTON. They can do that or else they can scrap it and return the land to the owners?

Mr. DENT. I misunderstood the gentleman's question. The Government has not the right to do it under the language of the appropriation bill of last July, which we are now trying to correct. It is on account of the language in that appropriation bill that the Government is unable to carry out its obligation, because that appropriation bill provided that no unexpended balance of any previous appropriation or no part of the present appropriation should be used for the payment of money for the purchase of real estate or construction of buildings.

Mr. LAYTON. Is there anything in this bill that repeals the prohibitory clause in that act of last July?

Mr. DENT. Surely. This bill expressly undertakes to do that.

Mr. LAYTON. It covers everything except the specific propositions here?

Mr. DENT. Nothing except the specific propositions.

Mr. MANN of South Carolina. As I understood the condemnation law, the Government had the right to condemn land for war purposes, and the party whose land they condemned had the right to accept the Government's price if he wished, or 70 per cent of it, and then sue for the difference between that and what he thought the land was worth?

Mr. DENT. That was the practice; in many cases——

Mr. MANN of South Carolina. That was the law heretofore. Under this law is it the intention to take from the Federal courts the right to hear those cases that are now pending as to every claim?

Mr. DENT. Not at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. What was the average price that was contracted to be paid per acre for this land or to be given by courts in condemnation proceedings?

Mr. DENT. I was not on the subcommittee that made the investigation of the cases. As I understood the gentleman who has charge of the bill, it was about $33 an acre.

Mr. HASTINGS. And how many acres? One hundred thousand?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. About how much has been paid for?

Mr. DENT. I can not answer the gentleman as to that. I am not familiar with the facts as to those details.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I dislike very much to differ with any of my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs, but I do think some of the provisions of this bill ought to be stricken out. One of them, in my judgment, is the section in relation to Camp Benning. I think it ought to be stricken out for three reasons: First, because of the expense that it will entail upon the United States in the transportation of officers and the supplies to this camp, located in the extreme southeastern part of our country and far from the centers of population; second, I think it ought to be stricken out as a rebuke to the men who had the nerve to put a proposition of this kind over without coming to Congress for the authority to act; third, I think it ought to be stricken out as a matter of justice to the poor people who live in that community. And I want to say that I am saying these things without prejudice on account of the location of this camp. I do not question but that it is located in a very desirable terrain, so far as that is concerned, over which to maneuver, and to engage in Infantry arm practice. I do not question those things at all. I think they are all true. But I do question the authority of a few men in the real estate division of the War Department going into a deal of this character when any man that had had vision enough to see across the street knew that the war was about at an end.

And I would like to see it stricken out because of the fact that when the armistice was signed not an acre of this ground had been bought and paid for. But when the news flashed over the wires to Columbus, Ga., and to Camp Benning, that the armistice was signed, these men, some of whom were in the uniform of the United States, went, to their discredit, to the citizens of that county and said to them: "Sell your land now and take your money, because if you do not take it now condemnation proceedings are hanging over you and you may not get your money for as long a time as it took to get money for cotton claims after the Civil War."

And they asked the men whose titles were defective to take the money and put it in the bank and hold it there until their abstracts were perfected. And I think we ought to strike out this clause for no other reason than to rebuke that conduct on the part of the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would not our refusal to enact this law make it impossible for the people to get their money?

Mr. McKENZIE. No, sir. This Congress passed a law, and perhaps with a good deal of fear—at least I had a good deal of fear in my bosom when I voted for the law—permitting the War Department to settle contracts which were illegal in form, and under which law I fear much has been lost to the Government of the United States. But in order to protect our citizens who had entered into contracts honestly we passed that law. As the Secretary admitted before our committee, that law takes care of these men in Georgia whose land had been taken by the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That applied only to unliquidated claims, did it not? These claims are liquidated and the amount has been ascertained.

Mr. McKENZIE. So much greater is the responsibility of the Government to pay them damages. Far be it from me to argue for any proposition that would injure a citizen of Georgia.

Mr. BEE. Would not the result of the gentleman's contention drive the owners of the land in Georgia into the Court of Claims or to Congress for an appropriation to reimburse them?

Mr. McKENZIE. It may be we can remedy that.

Mr. BEE. When?

Mr. McKENZIE. Any men who have a sense of justice in their hearts can pass a law in 24 hours in this Congress taking care of such a case as that.

More than that, I want to say, gentlemen of this House, that only three days ago I talked with a reputable citizen of the State of Georgia who came into my office to see me about this matter, and he assured me that 80 per cent of the men who owned the land on this tract would gladly take it back at the price that the Government offered to pay for it, but that the people living in the city of Columbus, perhaps under the domination of the Columbus Chamber of Commerce and those men at this camp there, would not do so. But that would not justify us in keeping 80 per cent of these people out of their homes.

I want to call your attention to another thing. It is a simple matter, but in it are the germs of justice. This community in Georgia is an old community. It is situated along the Chattahoochee River. The Chattahoochee River is navigable as far as the city of Columbus. One hundred and fifty years ago and more pioneers came into that territory, settled there, made their homes there, carved out their little fortunes on the hillside in that little county of Chattahoochee. There they raised their families, and there they buried their fathers, there they erected their cemeteries, there they put up their schoolhouses, and there they built their churches. Along comes the Government of the United States, led by a few petty officers in the Military Establishment, walks in there and slams down a condemnation suit to take 100,000 acres away from those American citizens in time of peace, to drive them from their homes, to scatter them over the country and remove them from the places where they had lived for generations, and where they had buried their forefathers, with everything that was dear to them taken away from them, and they driven out by the Government of the United States in time of peace.

I want to say to you, gentlemen, in my judgment, no such outrage has ever been perpetrated upon free men since the time the British drove the poor Acadians on their ships at the point of the bayonet and scattered them along the Atlantic coast, out of which outrage grew that beautiful story of Evangeline.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that the people of the county he speaks of as having been driven from their homes are only anxious for Congress to pay them for the land that has been taken. The county in which most of this land lies was carved out only a few years ago to satisfy certain political ambitions in that neighborhood, and it is the people in that small county who are left in the still smaller county who are objecting. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if that statement is true, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia who came into my office is a liar. But he looked to me like a truthful and honest man. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman stated that he would let these people come in with a bill for their claim, if they had any, against the Government and return this land.

I want to ask if the gentleman remembers one gentleman from Illinois speaking a while back of the McCormick claim, a small post-office matter, that had been here since the administration of Grover Cleveland, and that they had just passed a few weeks before? Does the gentleman remember that circumstance, and would he let these people wait and wait on for their money indefinitely?

Mr. McKENZIE. No. I want the gentleman from Maryland to understand that I am no more in favor of defrauding any one of these individual citizens of the State of Georgia than I would be in favor of defrauding a man in my own home town; not for a minute; and, feeling as I do about it, the reason why I denounce this thing is that in my judgment it was the greatest outrage and fraud ever perpetrated in the United States, notwithstanding it is a fact that it is a good place to have an Artillery school or a military instruction field. Consider the way in which it was conceived in iniquity and carried out over the protests of the Congress of the United States, when the Senate of the United States had told them to cease. Notwithstanding that, they went on and carried it out, and now we are called upon to ratify that sort of conduct.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am talking about these people whose lands were taken, whose courthouse was taken, and whose schoolhouses were taken.

Mr. McKENZIE. They will get justice.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the gentleman in favor of returning them to them?

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to present a few facts to this House in behalf of the people of Camp Bragg who have been driven from their homes. I am not here representing the War Department nor the good people of the city of Fayetteville who are anxious for the establishment of this camp, but the property owners there who have been driven from their homes, from their all, and who have not received one cent from the Government in payment for their property.

The territory embraced within Camp Bragg is about 75 per cent of it located in the county of Hoke, which is one of the counties composing the district which I have the honor to represent. They get none of the benefits from the establishment of the camp, but they have suffered most of the inconveniences that have arisen by reason of its having been established.

As I understand it, the Government, through the War Department, seeking a place to establish an artillery camp, went down there and selected this territory without being invited to do so by the citizens who owned the property embraced within the camp. My information from the War Department is that the Government has purchased and paid for 50,537 acres. It has contracted for 9,177 acres, leaving 60,739 acres now under condemnation proceedings. Gentlemen, the lands which they have purchased and which they have contracted for are located all over the territory embraced within the limits of the proposed camp.

They have destroyed the community interest. The churches have been torn down, the schoolhouses have been torn down, the roads have been abandoned, and it is now in an uninhabitable condition, even if the property owners could be restored to the position they were before the Government took charge. The land which they have not bought or contracted for the owners of it have been directed and ordered by the War Department to vacate, and told that if they planted their crops they could not reap them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOBINSON of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman very much for yielding. I wish to ask him, When was this desolation created? That will largely influence my vote upon this bill. I do not want these people to suffer——

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. They have already suffered.

Mr. BUTLER. Can they be restored?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. They can not be restored to their property.

Mr. BUTLER. When was this property taken from them and destroyed—about what time?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I have not the exact dates, but they were ordered to move out in the latter part of the year 1918.

Mr. BUTLER. After the armistice was signed?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. A large number of them were ordered to move out before the armistice was signed and a considerable number afterwards.

Mr. BUTLER. Was this desolation made there since the armistice was signed—this destruction?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I am not prepared to say. Probably some members of the subcommittee can give the gentleman more definite information than I can.

I will state to you gentlemen that this property is all these good people had. They have been driven from their homes. They have not received the money that the Government promised to pay them and can not buy homes elsewhere.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that a great many of them have purchased homes elsewhere and contracted to purchase homes elsewhere?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I was coming to that. A large number of them, relying upon the representations of this great Government that they would have their money in a short time, went elsewhere and contracted for homes, and have been unable to meet those obligations.

Mr. BUTLER. How many of them were there?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I have not the exact number.

Mr. BUTLER. As many as a hundred?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Several hundred.

Mr. BUTLER. Property owners?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Five or six hundred property owners, as this property was owned by small landowners largely.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that they were ordered out of there in the summer of 1918?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I do not know the exact date, but I know they were ordered to vacate the premises.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. That is true. They were ordered out about the middle of the summer.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. My colleague from the sixth district is more familiar with the fact than I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. So far as the injury inflicted upon these people is concerned, it does not make any difference whether it was before or since the signing of the armistice.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Certainly not. I cannot see that that makes any difference.

Mr. CARAWAY. They obeyed the orders of their Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. They obeyed the orders of their Government, and I want to state here that no graft has been inflicted on the Government in the contracts which have been entered into for the purchase of this land. The land paid for cost the Government $18.62 an acre.

Mr. WELLING. If the bill is passed, will that correct the evil you are speaking of?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. It will correct it in part.

Mr. WELLING. You are in favor of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. Yes; I am in favor of the bill, because that is the only manner in which they can get any relief at all.

I was going on to state that the land which was purchased and paid for cost the Government $18.62 an acre. My information is that the landowners received something like $16 an acre.

Mr. HASTINGS. Was that the contract price, or was that determined in condemnation proceedings?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. That which the Government contracted for and paid for and that which was condemned also.

Mr. HASTINGS. That was the average price?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. That was the average price which it cost the Government, but the landowner did not get all that sum. My information is that there are 700 different tracts embraced within this camp, and the Government sent its surveyors and surveyed each tract and procured an abstract, and the Government had to pay this cost in addition to the price it paid to the landowner.

So it cost the Government the sum of $18.62 per acre for the land which they have paid for, which they have contracted for, and the land the owners of which were driven from the premises is at a contract price of $12.09 per acre, leaving 60,739 acres now under condemnation proceedings.

Mr. HASTINGS. Have condemnation proceedings on any tract been finally determined.

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I am not advised as to that. Gentlemen, in my opinion—and I am not here representing the War Department—that, as a matter of business, it is to the interest of the taxpayers of this country that the Government go ahead and complete these contracts of purchase for this land and pay these people, and then, if it is not to the interest of the Government to maintain it as a camp, they can cut the land up in tracts of 100 or 200 acres, sell it, and make a profit on their investment. Land in that county, since the land was taken from these people and contracts entered into, has increased in price 50 per cent, not only in this particular section but all over the cotton belt.

I bought a small tract of land for $37.50 per acre about February 1, 1919, and I was offered a few days ago $75 per acre. That is on account of the high price of cotton and the fact that they made a good crop of cotton in that locality.

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman will yield, if that land has increased so much in value, how would the people suffer if you gave it back to them?

Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina. I tried to make that plain a few minutes ago. The Government owned land dotted all over this territory; they have torn down the churches, they have torn down the schoolhouses, and the roads have been abandoned and the community interests destroyed. It is not a fit place to live. If the Government should go ahead and complete the contracts, secure the entire acreage within the camp and then cut it up into tracts and sell it the community, interests could be established and it would be a fit place to live. [Applause.] Under the present conditions the citizen who has not sold his land to the Government is surrounded by lands owned by the Government, with no roads, no churches, no schools, and, in fact, no community interest, and his home and land is not a desirable place to live, and his property under the conditions brought about by the Government is valueless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All pro forma amendments are withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think there was a motion to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regarded that as a pro forma amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then I move to strike out the section.

Mr. BEE. The effect of that would be to kill the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; it is not the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HASTINGS) there were 3 ayes and 47 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the third paragraph under the heading "Reserve Corps" and subheading "Ordnance Supplies for Military Equipment of Schools and Colleges" of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate or for the construction of Army camps or cantonments, except in such cases at National Army or National Guard camps or cantonments which were in use prior to November 11, 1918, where it has been or may be found more economical to the Government, for the purpose of salvaging such camps or cantonments, to buy real estate than to continue to pay rentals or claims for damages thereon, and except where industrial plants have been constructed or taken over by the Government for war purposes, and the purchase of land is necessary in order to protect the interest of the Government: Provided, That there may be expended for the purposes hereinafter specified, from the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment which are available for such purposes, and, when any such balances are exhausted, from the appropriations made for such purposes under this act, the several sums as follows:

"INFANTRY.

"To complete the Infantry school at Camp Benning, Ga.: For the purchase of real estate, $515,252; for construction and to complete buildings now in process of construction, $250,000; total for Infantry school, $765,252: Provided, That no part of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support of the Army shall be expended for construction at Camp Gordon, Ga., and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to sell the real estate and buildings of such camp to the best advantage of the Government, the proceeds of such sale to be covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6 strike out lines 5 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen of the committee for granting me an extension of time, but I will not take all of it. The effect of the amendment I have offered is to strike from the bill the provision which directs that Camp Gordon be sold, salvaged, and the money put into the Treasury of the United States. I know that the Committee on Military Affairs is a very painstaking committee, and no man in the House has more respect or greater confidence in it than I have. In the main, I am heartily in favor of their report. I want to say at the outset that neither Benning nor Gordon are in my district. As a Georgia Representative, I am naturally interested in these projects, and I know the committee is acting wisely for the Government in reporting that the Infantry school at Camp Benning be completed. I am not going to take up the time of this committee in discussing that, for I think the mind of the committee is made up favorable to the project.

But I do want to say that, as a Georgia Representative, I have only received two protests from any of those so-called simple-minded citizens of Georgia protesting against their being removed from the premises embraced in Camp Benning. As to Camp Gordon, I appeal to you, my fellow colleagues, to let that camp remain. This bill is not asking any money from the Government for the purpose of completing or continuing Camp Gordon. I want to call your attention to some facts. The Government has expended in the erection of Camp Gordon $11,218,000. They have housing for 41,162 soldiers. They have 11,303 acres of land. It is one of the seven division posts which the Government has. At this post they have a hospital, sewerage, and it is a complete city, capable of caring for 41,000 people. The Government has had some experience in salvaging Army camps. I think you will find if you investigate that where they have been salvaged the Government did not realize as much as 15 per cent on the cost. I know that Nitro, situated in West Virginia, upon which the Government spent in the neighborhood of $70,000,000, when it was sold the Government only realized about $8,000,000.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Does the gentleman advise that we should not have sold Nitro, but should have kept it and gone on with it?

Mr. CRISP. I do not. I am not familiar with that proposition, but I do advise that we should retain Camp Gordon, and why do I say that? We all hope, of course, that wars are a thing of the past, but I apprehend that this Government is not going to do away entirely with preparations, for we must be prepared in the event that we should unfortunately become involved in war in the future. If that is true, we must have some posts where training can be given to our soldiers. Here is a complete city, centrally located. It is located almost in the center of the South, near a metropolitan city, with magnificent railroad connections, going all over the South, leading to the East and the West, accessible from all parts of the East and the South. It is easily accessible to the Atlantic ports and to the Gulf ports. You know that this Government is going to have some kind of military training, and, if so, you must have some posts where these troops can be concentrated and trained.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Has the gentleman ever been at Camp Gordon?

Mr. CRISP. I have never been at the camp. I have passed through it numerous times on the railroad, going back and forth from Washington to my home.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Has the gentleman ever asked anybody whether there was any place there where they could train troops?

Mr. CRISP. I have, and I asked the War Department officials and they say they want it kept. They say it is suitable, and let me say——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman quote the War Department official who says that men can be trained and drilled there?

Mr. CRISP. Oh, I have not gone into detail with any particular War Department official.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have been all over the ground, and we could not see where you could train and drill a regiment of troops.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to the gentleman that one of the most magnificent divisions, a division that reflected honor and glory upon this country at San Mihiel and the Argonne Forest in France, the Eighty-second Division, composed of New York, Massachusetts, and southern boys, were trained at Camp Gordon. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Were they not trained abroad?

Mr. CRISP. No; they were trained at Camp Gordon for a year before they went over there. I had two nephews myself who were trained there before they went over. This camp is not in Georgia simply because it is in the South. I say to you that the southern Representatives knew nothing about the camp being located there until it came out in the newspapers, and I will tell you who selected it. It was Gen. Leonard Wood. He was commander of the Department of the Southeast when we went into the war. He went over the country and he viewed the various spots and he selected these camps, and many of them were placed in the South for the very common-sense reason that the climate is warmer and that you have many more months in the year when you can train soldiers than you can where the climate is colder. That is why these camps were placed there. I doubt not that the War Department in the coming summer will want to give the National Guard military training. There must be some post to house them where they can get this training.

If Congress should pass a law providing for compulsory military training you must have Army posts, and I appeal to you, gentlemen, as a common-sense proposition, where you have this camp that will house 41,000 soldiers, that it ought to be retained. We are not asking any money for it. Why salvage it when you would get only about 10 or 15 per cent of its value?

Let me urge another reason why you should adopt my amendment, and I shall close. The General of our Army, Gen. Pershing, is to-day in Atlanta inspecting this camp. This Congress has shown confidence in Gen. Pershing because it has made him a full general. I ask you to defer directing that this camp be salvaged until you hear Gen. Pershing's report. If you adopt my amendment and strike this out when the bill goes to the Senate, you will have ample time to get Gen. Pershing's report, and if he reports that it should be salvaged and destroyed, I for one will be happy to acquiesce in his superior judgment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. In the gentleman's opinion is it necessary for us to have both Camps Benning and Gordon?

Mr. CRISP. I answer yes, because they are used for entirely different purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not Camp Gordon an Infantry camp?

Mr. CRISP. It was one of those general cantonments where Infantry was trained, as was done at all of these cantonment camps.

Mr. BUTLER. I note that Benning was also an Infantry camp.

Mr. CRISP. Benning is a school of Infantry. I will say to my good friend from Pennsylvania that the Government on its own volition, without any representation from us, moved the school of Infantry from Fort Sill to Fort Benning on account of its superior qualifications, and it is to be a permanent school for instruction. These others are emergency or regular cantonments.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to see just where we are and in what shape we are in the consideration of this bill. Did the Clerk read that part of the bill beginning in line 8, page 3?

The CHAIRMAN. No; under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into it was understood that the language in italics would be considered as original matter and that the language of the bill which is stricken out would be subject to amendment later and was not to be read.

Mr. GARRETT. That was a unanimous-consent agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, in considering the matter of appropriations for these new camps which we are creating, the committee has made the first attempt to compel the War Department to salvage and realize upon some of the Army camps and cantonments which were built during the war, for which we think there is no emergency in continuing. One of the best examples of that is at Camp Gordon, where the committee provides it shall be abandoned and salvaged and sold and the money placed in the Treasury. It was located 16 miles from Atlanta in a hilly country. It perhaps served its purpose as a place for the mere mobilization of troops. It houses 50,000 men, but there is practically no ground which is afforded there to train troops to make soldiers, and there is hardly ground upon which a company can be formed. There is not even a rifle range there, and I can not conceive of any military authority recommending the retention of Camp Gordon as a permanent military establishment at all. The land is very valuable, the buildings can be salvaged for a round sum of money. We are about to embark upon an enterprise which will cost us millions of dollars located just 85 miles to the south of it, where we provide for a basic Infantry training school of the Army, and if we are going to make a beginning in doing away with some of these tremendous overhead expenses, which they are trying to perpetuate in the Army which we inherited from the Army, Camp Gordon is a good place to begin to economize and wipe out and put the money in the Treasury.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand there are only about 2,000 acres at Camp Gordon, whereas there over 75,000 at Camp Benning.

Mr. ANTHONY. Ninety-seven thousand at Camp Benning.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no parallel between the two?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is absolutely no parallel. There is no ground whatever available for training at Camp Gordon. In the proximity of Atlanta are located many important military enterprises. Fort Oglethorpe is a few miles to the southwest, Fort McPherson is located in the city of Atlanta, and Camp Jessup, where a $3,000,000 motor transport-repair shop is located.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman any figures as to how much all this cost the Government at Camp Gordon?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not state, but if the figures of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] are correct, there has been fully $10,000,000 invested there. It is of temporary construction; the typical frame cantonment buildings——

Mr. BUTLER. How much does the gentleman imagine we can sell it for?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we would realize 15 per cent on the cost of the buildings and every dollar on the cost of the land.

Mr. BUTLER. Most of the expense, of course, was putting up the buildings?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, this is not even a surplus property. If Camp Gordon were a surplus camp all that has been said in favor of the committee amendment would be justified. But it is not a surplus camp. The board of officers appointed to decide as to how much war material should be retained and how much salvaged decided that we should provide for nine divisional camps, and of those nine divisional camps Camp Gordon is one. There was wisdom in the decision of this board of the War Department. If we take the standards of wisdom of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs that has reported this amendment over the protest of some of us who can not agree if we take their opinion as the standard as to whether or not we should have nine divisions, I refer you to the fact that the Army reorganization bill, which we have recently taken up for consideration, starts out with the proposition that we are going to have nine divisions.

If you have nine divisions and you throw away one of the divisional camps, what are you going to do to house one division of American soldiers? You have got to have a home for them. They already have——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Excuse me, inasmuch as I have only five minutes.

They already have a home, and it is located near a great city, and all the Army men say that camps of this character, in order to be a success and to keep the boys happy, must be within short distances of great cities. The terrain here is most admirable for an army camp. It is the best drained camp that we saw, and it is in better condition than anyone we visited in all our trip.

Now, they say there is no land there to train the men; that you can not get them out to parade or train them to shoot, but it is only a little way to Camp Benning, which is the place where the great training is to come for the Infantry soldiers, and is close enough so that you do not even have to put them on a railroad train, but you can march them across country and give them that training at the time they are going to get the training that they need in the field. It would be folly for us in the Military Committee to write a law that was going to handicap military experts of our country who have devoted their whole lives to the development of a military arm, and say to them "You shall not have this and shall not have that," when we already have it, and it will not cost us anything. Why should we destroy that which they have been trying to build up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOTOR TRANSPORT CORPS.

To complete motor transport schools as follows:
At Camp Holabird, Md.: For the purchase of real estate, $140,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum from now on.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from Texas withhold a moment? I want to say that after the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] I shall move to rise.

Mr. BLANTON. All right.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I realize the fact that the committee is dealing with an important subject, but I have one of more importance. I have one that concerns the fuel supply of the country, one that involves the delivery of coal to the American people who are cold and shivering. The urgency of the situation justifies me in asking your kind indulgence for a little while.

Dr. Garfield, under Executive order, has again assumed charge of the fuel proposition. Mr. Hines, Director of Railways, who has been acting as the agent of Dr. Garfield, is transporting and delivering that coal. The coal is being carried all over this country—to New England and to the far western States—and it is being delivered without the knowledge of the operator, the producer, as to who is getting it, and therefore the operator has no opportunity, has had none, to invoice it to the person or corporation to whom it is ultimately delivered. The result of that is—and I am speaking for 400 coal operators in my district—that the coal operators are without money with which to meet their pay rolls. Those operators have been calling upon the banks for help, but the banks have exhausted their power, having loaned money until their legal reserve has been reached or impaired.

Now, I have received within the last few days many telegrams, and one of them I ask permission to read. It is addressed to me at this city, and is as follows:

WELCH, W. VA., December 10, 1919.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
Washington, D. C.:

We have outstanding for coal shipments during last week October and all November $208,433.04. Of this amount we have been advised that $13,926.02 has been turned over to several railroads; $20,993.74 has been diverted to regional committees but not to final consignees; while $173,563.28 is outstanding on which we have received no diversion notice, neither has it been delivered to the original consignees. Payment of all these accounts is due to-day. You can see that we will be unable to meet our operating expenses much longer.

CRYSTAL BLOCK COAL COKE CO.,
CENTRAL POCAHONTAS COAL CO.,
(Signed) EDWARD O'TOOLE.

These two companies are of not large financial strength, small in comparison to other companies operating in the great coal region embraced in my district. They are operating in a field that during the strike has been the salvation of the country.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. For my information, I would like to know why the operators only produced 50 per cent of their capacity the last summer.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The operators in my district during this period of time—the time that has elapsed since the Government last assumed charge—have produced more than 100 per cent normal capacity, and the reason they did not produce coal last summer was because Members of this body and certain other men in this country advocated that the consumer should not buy coal then. They said the plan to buy coal was merely a scheme and device——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will conclude in five minutes, so that the committee can rise?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes; I will do that.

They said that it was a scheme of the operators to induce the people to buy coal; that there was not and would not be any shortage of coal in the country; and that if the people would wait the price of coal would go down.

On this floor I took occasion to say that those who gave this advice assumed a terrible responsibility.

The National Coal Operators Association spent $80,000 in newspaper advertisements warning the public of the danger of delay in laying in their supply.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. Was it the Fuel Administration that recommended that the people should not put in a supply of coal last summer?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. No. I say it was a Member of this body along with others not connected with the Fuel Administration.

Mr. LITTLE. I think, perhaps, the gentleman may be right about that, but I think the Fuel Department also recommended that.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. No. Every sensible man—every man that had any sense at all—wanted the mines to be operating in the summer time as well as in winter in order that these mines should get out the coal which the people of the country required for their consumption as well as to take care of the requirements of foreign countries.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. In my section, I will say to the gentleman, we were advised early last spring to lay in our coal for our supply.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. That advice was sound.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. After the recent experience we will not have much trouble from now on in getting people to lay in their coal early, will we?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I am afraid the people will forget.

Mr. BLANTON. The people in my country will not forget it.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. We are trying to get some money in some way to enable our coal operators to take care of the financial problem involved.

Now, Mr. Hines, the Director of Railroads, and Dr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator—a very fine man—have taken up the matter with the governor of the board controlling the regional reserve banks, and they have decided that the regional reserve banks will discount notes executed by the coal operators; but the fact is that the constituent banks, the member banks, who must rediscount the paper, can not take care of that paper. I received notice that over 2,400 cars of coal had been shipped out of my district on day before yesterday. The value of that coal is somewhere in the neighborhood of half a million dollars. This was for only one day. The condition covers more than a month. I should judge it would take somewhere between fifteen and twenty million dollars to take care of these operators in this present stressful situation. What will we do to remedy the situation? The miners must be paid. The records show that the miners are paid in cash, after deducting their commissary account and their rent bill and all that, at least a dollar in cash for each ton of coal mined and shipped. Where is the money to come from to pay these men?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman says the Government takes this coal and delivers it to the respective purchasers?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. It takes that coal and transfers it to committees, wherever they are. The Railroad Administration acts as the agent of the Fuel Administrator in delivering coal, but it refuses to act as agent in collecting the price of the coal. This it ought to do.

Mr. EMERSON. Somebody is going to collect the money. Who is going to do that?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. There is no one to collect it. I had an operator tell me not long ago that, in 1917, of the coal he shipped he had never found out where 50 cars of his coal had gone to. You now understand the chaotic condition of the coal business and the dilemma of the coal operators of West Virginia to-day.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Was he ever paid for it?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. He has not been. He does not know who got his coal, and it may take two years from now before the coal producer finds out who has been getting his coal.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will be very glad to yield to my good friend from Virginia.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Is it possible for the banks in the gentleman's district to accommodate the operators?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I am glad you asked that question. Four days ago the banks in the city of Huntington were within 1½ per cent of their legal reserve, and a two weeks' pay roll was then due; now these banks have reached the limit of their reserve.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman made any investigation or had any conference with the Fuel Administration or the Railroad Administration with respect to the matter?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I have talked with the agents of the Fuel Administrator and with the assistant director of railroads, and they said, "The regional banks would take care of it." I inquired how they were going to do it. Whenever a constituent bank loans money to a coal operator it takes the operator's note and rediscounts it; but when the bank gets beyond its 10 per cent limit it can not go any further—a national bank can only lend to a customer 10 per cent of its working capital—and the coal operators in my section of the country have gotten all the money the banks can lend them.

In addition to this, the fourth installment of Government taxes will be due on next Monday. The weak mines in my State are at the end of their row. Lack of money and low price of coal are forcing them to shut down. Something must be done by the Government immediately to relieve the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8819) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the rule is this bill the continuing order to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks either this would be or the Private Calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. You would have to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the Speaker give any indication as to whom he will recognize to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think he will recognize the gentleman from Kansas, but the Chair would prefer not to state definitely this evening.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. To-morrow being pension day, probably the Pension Committee would succeed in getting recognition.

The SPEAKER. As far as the Chair knows the Pension Committee has no business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was informed that the Pension Committee had no business.

The SPEAKER. That was the impression of the Chair.

Mr. EMERSON. I had some hope that the Private Calendar might be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. We thought we might probably consider the Private Calendar to-morrow.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. To-morrow would be pension day.
